

UNIV. OF TORONTO LIBRARY

Presented to The Library of the University of Toronto by
Mrs. George M. Bertram

Copyrighted 1901. By George D. Sproul.

THE COMPLETE WORKS

THÉOPHILE GAUQUER

Historien

1844

(One)

The Approach to Venice — cap. 10
placé à l'entrée de la ville — 1844
DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY

the appearance of the "On the" and "the" in the parts above the line in the "On the" and "the" in the 62773

L5

THE COMPLETE WORKS of THÉOPHILE GAUTIER

Volume IV

Travels in Italy

Fortunio

One of Company's romances

King's College

Translated and Edited by

PROFESSOR F. C. DE SUMICHRAST
DEPARTMENT OF FRENCH, HARVARD UNIVERSITY

NEW YORK

Dutton, Seashell & Co.

MCMX

404353
3.7.42

ONE THOUSAND COPIES OF THIS EDITION
HAVE BEEN PRINTED FOR SUBSCRIBERS

PQ
2258
A27
1910
v. 4

Copyright, 1901
BY GEORGE D. SPROUL

Contents

INTRODUCTION	Page 3
LAGO MAGGIORE	“ 15
MILAN	“ 25
THE LAST SUPPER—VERONA	“ 34
VENICE	“ 42
SAN MARCO	“ 71
THE PALACE OF THE DOGES	“ 109
THE GRAND CANAL	“ 130
LIFE IN VENICE	“ 141
GONDOLIERS AND SUNSETS	“ 158
THE ARSENAL—FUSINE	“ 168
THE ACADEMY	“ 180
THE STREETS — THE EMPEROR'S FÊTE DAY	“ 213
SAN BIAGGIO — THE CAPUCHIN CONVENT	“ 229
CHURCHES AND SCUOLE	“ 242
THE GHETTO — MURANO — VICENZA	“ 262
PADUA	“ 270
FERRARA	“ 285
FLORENCE	“ 296

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Introduction

IF Spain, as stated in the Introduction to “Travels in Spain,” always attracted the French mind, so did Italy. It did more — it attracted the Frenchman himself and induced him to travel.

For one who visited the Iberian peninsula, a thousand crossed the Alps. Madrid, Granada, Seville were rivalled and surpassed by Naples, Rome, Florence, Venice, and Milan. There had always been inter-communication between the two countries; civilisation came to Gaul in the train of Cæsar’s legions; the Renaissance flourished in the shadow of the Apennines before it swept over the valleys of the Seine and the Loire. Petrarch became a living force in French literature, and Leonardo da Vinci died the guest of Francis I at Amboise. In the days of the Valois it was an Italian woman who dominated blood-stained France, and in the last stand of the nobility against centralising monarchy it was an Italian cardinal against whom fought the Condés and the Longuevilles. Of the many triumphs which the Sun-King enjoyed to the full, few were sweeter to him than the sight of the Doge of Venice bowing at the foot of the great throne in the splendid gallery at Versailles.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The Romanticists could not escape the fascination of Italy, and in certain respects they did not attempt to do so. Rome itself — which had so happily inspired Joachim du Bellay — did not attract them, for the City on the Seven Hills was too classical for them, and classicism was their bête noire ; but Venice, with its unique situation, its wealth of legend, tradition, and history, with its Bridge of Sighs, its Leads, its Grand Canal, its Rialto, seemed to them to fulfil every condition required of a city worthy of the admiration and the fanatical worship of the poet and the painter. It is interesting to note that neither Naples nor Florence had the same charm for them ; that they were scarcely affected by Pisa, Bologna, and Milan, while Ferrara and Padua did appeal to them in greater measure and with more certainty. The real gem of Italy for them, the typical city, was unquestionably Venice. Two of their gods had set the seal of their approval upon it : Shake-spare had made it the scene of one of his masterpieces, and Byron had lived, loved, and sung there.

INTRODUCTION

Thus Gautier, who, even in 1850, was still very much of a Romanticist, felt himself strongly drawn to the land of the orange and the myrtle. The painter and the poet in him longed to behold the Venice of his dreams, the Venice which had inspired Musset — whose verse no man forgets, once he has read it. He could have dispensed with all else if only he saw the City on the Lagoons, and when he did finally cross the Alps it was with feverish impatience that he hurried on. Neither Como nor Garda, neither Milan nor Verona could hold him — on the distant horizon, above the blue line of the Adriatic, shone the splendour, the mirage, the place of his dreams, the Jerusalem of his artistic soul. And once he reached it he could not tear himself away; he lingered in it; he was never weary of wandering in and out of its streets, of being swept along its canals, of passing from palace to church, from church to square, from square to island. He was fully, deeply satisfied. He enjoyed the exquisite bliss of the complete realisation of a rich and varied fancy, so surpassingly fair that he had dreaded seeing it vanish, that he had trembled at the possibility of its proving untrue. But it did not. Venice was all and more than he had looked for ; he basked in his satisfaction ; he revelled in his joy ; he exulted in his pleasure with the same complete, profound sense of triumph as Kingsley when he, also, realised a long caressed dream and "At last !" found himself in the West Indies.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

This fact told on Gautier's book, or on his articles, rather ; for the "Travels in Italy" are letters of travel collected and republished in book form, like all his other works of this class. He was on the staff of la Presse when he started on his trip, and it was to that paper that he sent his "copy," the first instalment of which appeared on September 24, 1850. Very quickly he took his readers to Venice — his letter of October 3 being devoted to that city. At this time he carried his story no farther than the description of the Grand Canal, and there occurred a break of nearly a year in the publication of the letters. They were resumed on September 12, 1851, in the same journal, but under a somewhat modified title. The first one was : "Far from Paris — Notes of Travel ;" the second one, "Far from Paris — Life in Venice ;" the original one reappearing only in January, 1853, when the chapter on Florence was published in le Pays. That chapter ends abruptly, before Gautier has fairly entered upon the study of the city, its monuments, and its art treasures. As for Rome and Naples, there is not a word about them. Venice swamped the rest of Italy, not only because, as he tells us, he had spent a much longer time there than he had planned to do, but because when he began to write of this city of his dreams he could not stay his pen ; the theme was congenial and the words came of themselves ; one scene called up another, one picture reminded him of another masterpiece not yet seen — and on, on he went, forgetful of all else in that fair land save of the fact that he was in Venice, that Venice was lovely, that he adored it, and that he must make every one of his readers adore it too.

INTRODUCTION

It should be added that Gautier, who quite recognised the fact that he had not done justice to Florence, and had not written a line about Rome, intended to continue his book until he had treated these two cities and Naples in the same way as Venice ; but, alas ! the project was never carried out, no more than many another which he caressed for a time, and when in 1875 the “Travels in Italy” appeared in book form with the sub-title “Italia,” that was the end of the attempt to complete the story of the trip.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Of course it would have been interesting to possess all Gautier had to say about the Eternal City and the City of Flowers, but it may be affirmed that it would not have been as characteristic, as deeply marked with intense feeling, with warm, passionate love of the subject. To him Italy meant Venice, and Venice Italy. The other places were no doubt interesting and attractive, and the painter-half of him could delight in the Tribuna and the Loggie, but the whole of him was wrapped up in San Marco and the Campanile, in San Giorgio Maggiore and the Dogana, in the Lido and the Grand Canal. He had given his readers the very cream of Italy at the outset; neither he nor they could care for aught else after that.

Yet more. He had been essentially Romanticist; he had carried out the ideas of the school and laid stress on the very points which constituted, for Hugo and his followers, the chief value of the new art, now, alas! no longer new and already being replaced by a truer and more satisfactory form. Picturesqueness, colour, exoticism, quaintness, eccentricity, grotesqueness, splendour, abundance of poetical epithets, wealth of imagination, gorgeousness of description, stateliness and variety of scene — these were called for by all Romanticists, and these he gave in abundance. There might be — there was another Venice besides the exquisite city he saw, with its “pirate basilica,” its gallery of palaces, its wondrous prospects, its squalid quarters — there was the Venice of history, the one Montesquieu and Saint Réal knew, the oligarchical republic so long the Mistress of the Seas; there was the Venice groaning under the yoke of the Austrian, that mourned while its masters feasted. Of this one he has given us a glimpse, but no more. Then the Venice of the Venetians themselves, with its own mode of life, its own peculiarities of thought, its own characteristic manners, — the actual living Venice; but that he speaks not of and thinks not of.

INTRODUCTION

The reason for this is not far to seek.* The whole Romanticist school laid the greatest stress on externals, and cared little or nothing for deep and minute analysis of feeling or passion. It was impulsive, not logical; emotional, not rational; passionate, but superficial. It was carried away by its feelings, by its nerves; it could not dwell long on any one subject; assiduous, persevering, laborious, minute study was repugnant to its character. It loved to flit from one picturesque subject to another. It craved for whatever was novel; it revelled in the sensational. It was opposed to the psychology of the writers of the seventeenth century who saw in Man the one and only subject worthy of engrossing their attention ; it was hostile to the scepticism of the eighteenth century, that scorned tradition and turned legend into ridicule. The Romanticist school had little thought for man ; the environment, the background, the stage-setting were more important in its eyes. Accuracy in matters historical it flouted too readily ; the important thing was that history should be attractive, brilliant, richly coloured, striking.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

And it is much in this way that Gautier understood Venice. It is the splendid scene, the long line of palaces, the flowing waters of the canals, the lofty campaniles bathed in rosy light, the glistening mosaics, the picturesque attitudes of the gondoliers that he reproduces with unrivalled skill. It is a magnificent background, a superb scene made ready for some great human drama, and in this respect his description is unequalled and wholly satisfactory. He has done exactly what he started out to do. His programme is fulfilled to the letter, and his book is the work of an artist and a poet that sees marvellously well, and makes his reader see with him. Victor Hugo himself could not make the scenes more lifelike. The book is full of poetic feeling, of ardent love of beauty, of the deep sentiment of art. Bar a weak point here and there, there are few finer bits than the account of the arrival in Venice, — a “Rain, Steam and Speed” that recalls Turner; few more heartfelt and exquisite farewells than his adieu to Venice, which even Byron’s “Adieu to thee, fair Rhine !” or Walter Scott’s “Harp of the North, farewell !” do not surpass. There can, indeed, be no farewell to the Venice Gautier saw and which he makes his readers see. It is the poetic image, the idealised vision which for ever remains in the memory.

INTRODUCTION

1844

see the

1844

of 1844

1844

1844

1844

1844

1844

1844

1844

1844

1844

Travels in Italy

TRAVELS IN ITALY

ITALIA

LAGO MAGGIORE

AS soon as we had crossed the crest which separates Switzerland from Italy, I was struck by the extreme difference in the temperature. On the Swiss slope the weather had been delightful, — soft, balmy, and bright, — but on the Italian there blew an icy wind, and great, mist-like clouds swept constantly over us. The cold was the more bitter by contrast with the previous warmth. The rain accompanied us on our way until we reached Lago Maggiore. At early dawn the sky began to clear, though vast banks of black and dark-gray clouds from which still fell occasional showers, rose behind the mountains on the other side of the lake.

The road follows the shore past endless gardens and villas with white peristyles, roofs of curved tiles, and terraces covered with luxuriant vines upborne by granite supports. On the terraces, which frequently rise one above another, and which are turned into carefully cultivated gardens, bloom all manner of flowers and shrubs. I noticed repeatedly and not without astonishment, for it was the first time that I had come across them, great clumps of gigantic blue hortensia.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The three Borromean Islands, Isola Madre, Isola Bella, and Isola dei Pescatori, are situated in the northern part of the lake, which forms a sort of an elbow, one end of which is turned towards Domo d' Ossola. Originally these islands were barren rocks. Prince Vitaliano Borromeo had loam brought there and built gardens of European reputation. I purposely use the word "built," for masonry plays a great part in them, as it does indeed in nearly all Italian gardens, which are architectural works rather than gardens. Isola Madre consists, like Isola Bella, of a series of terraces rising one above another, and surmounted by a palace. Isola Bella, which is very plainly seen from the road, has a wealth of turrets, of slender spires, of statues, fountains, porticos, colonnades, vases, and of the richest architectural decoration. There are even trees, — cypresses, orange trees, myrtles, lime trees, Canada pines; but plainly vegetation is a mere accessory. The very natural idea of putting verdure, flowers, and sward into a garden was an after-thought, like all natural ideas. Some distance farther the arcaded houses of Isola dei Pescatori show their bases laved by the waters of the lake ; their rustic aspect contrasting pleasantly with the somewhat pretentious pomp of Isola Madre and Isola Bella.

LAGO MAGGIORE

The islands, seen from the shore, do not justify the enthusiastic descriptions which have been written of them. The seven terraces of Isola Bella, ending in unicorns and Pegasi, have a theatrical aspect which scarcely fits in with the Borromean motto, “ Humilitas,” inscribed everywhere. Isola Madre, with its square terraces supporting a square mansion, is symmetrical and dull, and one cannot but wonder that these two islands should have been celebrated so enthusiastically. Both the lake and the road are very full of life. On the lake are fishing-boats, ferry-boats and pyroscaphs which ply between Sesto Calende and Bellinzona ; on the road ox-carts, carriages, and foot-passengers carrying the inevitable umbrella. The peasant women, sometimes pretty, are afflicted with goitre like the Valaisian women.

On approaching Arona, a colossal statue of Saint Carlo Borromeo which overlooks the lake, is seen on a hill to the right. It is, next to the Colossus of Rhodes and the Colossus of Nero at the Maison Dorée, the loftiest statue ever made. The saint, in an attitude full of nobility and simplicity, holds a book in one hand and with the other appears to bestow his blessing on the land he protects and which lies outstretched at his feet.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Arona has a thoroughly Spanish look. The houses have projecting roofs and balconies, the lower windows are grated, and on the walls are painted panels and madonnas. At the inn we came upon an inner court adorned with pillars and galleries just as in Andalusia.

The lake ends at Sesto Calende, where the Ticino issues from Lago Maggiore. Sesto Calende is on the farther bank and the stream is crossed by a ferry, for the Milan road passes through that little town. I rather liked Sesto Calende. It was market day, a piece of luck for a traveller, for market day brings from the country districts numbers of typical peasants whom otherwise it would be very difficult to come across. Most of the women wore a striking and very effective head-dress. Their hair, plaited and rolled carefully at the back of the head, was held in place by thirty or forty silver pins arranged in the form of an aureole, that showed above the head like the dentellations of a comb; a larger pin adorned at each end with enormous metal olives passed through the chignon; the whole recalling the head-dress of the Valencian women. These pins, called spontoni, are rather costly, and yet I have seen them worn by poor women and young girls with frayed skirts and bare and dusty feet. No doubt they sacrificed to this piece of luxury other objects of prime necessity, — but is not the prime necessity for women to be beautiful, and are not silver pins preferable to shoes?

LAGO MAGGIORE

The Austrian dominions begin at Sesto Calende; the other shore of the lake is Piedmontese. It is at Sesto Calende that for the first time one comes upon the tight-fitting blue trousers and the white tunics of the Austrians.

I must not leave Sesto Calende without sketching the portrait of a young woman upon the threshold of a shop, the dark interior of which formed a warm, strong background, against which she stood out like a head by Giorgione. Her beauty was of the purest Southern type. Her black eyes shone like coals under her amber brow; her complexion was of that uniform tone, that faccia smorta which is in no wise sickly, and which merely indicates that passion concentrates all the blood in the heart; her thick, close, shining hair, curling in short waves, swelled on her temples as if the wind had blown it out, and her neck and shoulders formed a clean and splendid line. She let me look at her quietly, without self-consciousness or coquetry, guessing that I was either a painter or a poet, perhaps both, and kindly let me enjoy one aspect of her beauty.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The Austrian postilions wear a picturesque costume, consisting of a green jacket with yellow and black aiguillettes, jack-boots, a hat with a copper band, and on the hip the horn which recurs so often in Schubert's melodies. It is notable that in every country the postilion who drives civilisation by post, since civilisation and travelling are synonymous, is one of those who longest remain faithful to local colour. He is the Past driving the Future and cracking his whip.

From Sesto Calende to Milan the road is bordered with vineyards and groves of trees, which grow most luxuriantly and vigorously. The foliage bounds the view on all hands, and you travel between two lines of verdure kept fresh by running brooks. A splendid avenue of trees indicates the approach to the city, which has a very majestic appearance from this side. The Triumphal Arch, under which could easily be placed the Carrousel Arch and which almost rivals in size the Arc de l'Étoile, gives to the entrance a monumental character borne out by the other buildings. On the summit of the arch an allegorical figure of Peace drives a bronze car drawn by six horses. At the four angles of the entablature are equeuries mounted on prancing brazen steeds and holding wreaths. Two colossal figures of river-gods leaning upon urns are placed against the huge panel on which is inscribed the votive inscription; and four pairs of Corinthian columns mark the divisions of the monument, separate the cornice, and form three distinct arcades. The central one is astonishingly high.

LAGO MAGGIORE

Having passed through this archway, one enters the Nuevo Parco, which appeared to me almost as large as the Champ de Mars in Paris. On the left rises a vast amphitheatre intended for manœuvres and open-air performances; at the back rises the old castle; and beyond, against the blue sky, stands out like silver filigree the white silhouette of the Duomo, which has in no wise the form of a dome. Duomo in Italy is a generic term and does not imply a cupola.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

As soon as one enters the streets, the height of the buildings, the coming and going of the people, the general cleanliness and comfort make the tourist feel that he is in a living capital, — quite a rare thing in Italy, where there are so many dead cities. Numberless carriages travel rapidly along the flagged tracks, somewhat like stone rails, set in the pebbly pavement. The houses look like mansions, the mansions like hotels, the hotels like palaces, the palaces like temples. Everything is grand, regular, majestic, if somewhat pompous. On all sides are seen columns, architraves, and balconies of granite. Milan is somewhat like both Madrid and Versailles, with a spruceness which Madrid lacks. The resemblance to Spain which I have already spoken of strikes one at every step, and I cannot help noting it again, for I am not aware that it has been remarked upon previously. The windows are hung with great white and yellow striped blinds, the shops have curtains of the same colour, which recall the Spanish tendidos; the women of the middle class and those who are not in full dress, wear the mezzaro, a sort of black veil which imitates the mantilla very closely. The illusion would be almost complete, were it not destroyed by the presence of the Austrians.

LAGO MAGGIORE

I had been told to go to the best hotel in Milan, the Hôtel de la Ville, in the Corso Servi (now Corso Vittorio Emanuele), which fully deserves its reputation. The façade is a very good piece of architecture, adorned with pilasters, brackets, and busts of celebrated Italians, orators, painters, poets, historians, and warriors. The staircase, worthy of a royal residence, is covered from top to bottom with remarkable stucco work and paintings of incredible richness and amazing workmanship. The ceiling is particularly remarkable. It represents various mythological subjects, with monochromes, bass-relievi, pilasters, and flowers so brilliant and so admirably painted that Diaz would envy them. All the rooms are decorated with equal care and taste; the smallest hallways and corridors are splendid and interesting. As for the dining-room, the luxuriance of the ornamentation is overpowering. Eight colossal caryatides, alternately male and female, watch the traveller at his meals and intimidate him with their fixed stony glance. These caryatides support a ceiling divided into compartments of unimaginable richness. Everywhere festoons, carvings, pendentives, imitation gems and gilding more brilliant than reality can possibly be. This will suffice to give an idea of Milanese luxury.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

It is so much the habit of travellers to speak ill of hotels and hotel-keepers that I here do this superb establishment the justice it deserves. I shall have enough descriptions of an entirely different kind to contrast with this one.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

MILAN

THE Duomo naturally attracts every tourist in Milan at once; it dominates the city, of which it is the centre, the attraction, and the wonder. You proceed forthwith, even on a night when there is no moon, to note at least its general outline.

The Piazza del Duomo is somewhat irregular in form. Its houses with their massive pillars and their saffron-coloured awnings, composed of buildings erected irregularly and varying in height, set off the cathedral admirably. Buildings often lose more than they gain by being cleared of their surroundings. This has been proved in the case of several Gothic monuments which were not, as had been supposed, spoiled by the stalls and hovels which had gradually grown up beside them. Besides, the Duomo is entirely isolated. But I think that nothing is better for a palace, a church, or any other regular edifice than to be surrounded by incoherent structures which bring out its noble proportions.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The first effect produced upon the sight-seer who looks at the Duomo from the Square, is its dazzling appearance. The whiteness of the marble contrasting with the blue of the heavens is most striking; the church is like a vast lace of silver laid upon a background of lapis-lazuli. That is the first impression, and it is also the last; when I think of the Duomo at Milan, it appears to me thus.

The Duomo is one of the few Gothic churches in Italy, but the Gothic is very different from ours. It does not exhibit the simple faith; it has not the dread, mysterious, and darksome depth, the emaciated forms, the upspringing from earth to heaven, the austere character which sets aside beauty as too sensual, and uses matter only in so far as it enables it to rise towards God. The Italian Gothic is elegant, graceful, and brilliant, such as might be devised for fairy palaces and used for the construction of Alcazars and mosques just as well as for a Catholic temple. Its delicacy allied to its whiteness gives it the appearance of a glacier with its innumerable aiguilles, or of a gigantic concretion of stalactites. It is difficult to believe that it is the handiwork of man.

MILAN

The façade is exceedingly simple. It consists of an acute angle like the gable of an ordinary house, bordered by marble lacework. The wall, which has no projecting portion or order of architecture, is pierced by five doors and eight windows, and divided by six groups of fluted columns, or rather, of ribs ending in hollowed points surmounted by statues, with the interstices filled by brackets and niches which support and shelter figures of angels, saints, and patriarchs. Behind these spring up, like the pillars of a basilica, a crowded forest of finials, pinnacles, and minarets, of aiguilles of white marble, and the central spire, which looks as if it had been crystallised in the air as it springs into the sky to a dizzying height, carrying close to the heavens the Virgin who stands upon its utmost point, one foot upon the crescent. On the centre of the façade are inscribed the words, "Mariæ nascentæ," which form the dedication of the cathedral.

Begun by Gian Galeazzo Visconti, and continued by Lodovico il Moro, the modern basilica was completed by Napoleon I. It is the largest church next to Saint Peter's at Rome and the Cathedral at Seville. The interior is majestic and noble in its simplicity. Rows of columns in pairs divide it into five naves.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

These groups of columns, in spite of their real mass, appear light on account of the slender proportions of the shafts. Above their capitals rises a sort of open and richly sculptured gallery, in which are placed statues of saints; then the ribbing continues and meets at the summit of the vaulting, adorned with trefoils and Gothic interlacements painted with such wonderful perfection that the eye would be deceived if here and there the bare stone did not show through the broken plaster.

In the centre of the transept cross an opening surrounded by a railing enables one to look into the chapel in the crypt where rests Saint Carlo Borromeo within a crystal bier covered with silver plates. Saint Carlo Borromeo is the most venerated saint in this part of the country; his virtues and his behaviour at the time the plague raged in Milan made him popular and keep his memory green.

At the entrance of the choir, on a bay adorned by a crucifix surrounded by adoring angels, hangs the following inscription in a wooden frame: "Attendite ad petram unde excisi estis."

On either side rise two magnificent pulpits of metal, supported by superb bronze figures and overlaid with silver bassi-relievi, the workmanship of which is more valuable than the material even. The panels of the organ, placed not very far from the pulpit, were painted by Procacini, if I am not mistaken, and around the choir run the stations of the Cross, carved by Andrea Biffi, and some other sculptures. The weeping angels who mark the stations have varied attitudes and are delightful, though somewhat effeminate. The general impression is of religious simplicity ; a soft light induces recollection ; the great pillars spring to the vaulting with a feeling of aspiring faith ; no obtrusive detail destroys the majesty of the ensemble. The general plan of the building is grasped at a glance. The splendid elegance of the exterior seems to be veiled in mystery and to become more humble. The exterior is perhaps pagan in its lightness and whiteness, but the interior is unquestionably Christian.

MILAN

The sacristy contains treasures which did not surprise me, for I had seen the wardrobe of Our Lady of Toledo, one single dress of which, covered with black and white pearls, is worth seven millions, but the sacristy at Milan, none the less, contains incredible riches. I shall first mention, because art must always take precedence of gold and silver, a fine "Flagellation of Christ " by Cristoforo Solari, called il Gobbo, a Milanese painter, and a painting by Daniele Crespi representing a miracle of Saint Carlo Borromeo, a work of masterly power and great ferocity of inspiration; next, the silver busts of the bishops, of Saint Sebastian, and Saint Thekla, the patroness of the parish church, studied with rubies and topazes; a golden cross starred with sapphires, garnets, smoky topazes, and rock crystals; a magnificent eleventh-century copy of the Gospels, presented by Bishop Ribertus, written in gold throughout and bearing upon its covers, which are chased in the Byzantine style, a Christ wearing a skirt and accompanied by the four symbolical figures, the lion, the ox, the eagle, and the angel; a pail for holy water made of ivory and provided with silver-gilt handles in the shape of chimeras; a pyx by Benvenuto Cellini, which is a wonder of elegance and delicacy; the feather mitre of Saint Carlo Borromeo; and pictures in silk by Lodovico Pellegrini.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

In the corner of one of the naves, before ascending to the roof, I glanced at a monument adorned with allegorical figures in bronze by Leone Leoni (Aretino) from the designs of Michael Angelo, in a superb, violent style. The roof itself, bristling with finials and supported with flying buttresses which form corridors in perspective, is composed, like the rest of the building, of great slabs of marble. It rises far above the highest buildings in the city. A bas-relief, admirably carved, is set within each flying buttress. Each turret bears twenty-five statues. I do not believe that anywhere else are so many carved figures contained within a similar space; the statues of the Duomo, which number 6716, would people a town of fair size. I had read of the church in Morea, painted in the Byzantine style by the monks of Mount Athos, which contains no less than three thousand figures, large and small, but this is nothing by the side of the Duomo at Milan. Among the statues is one by Canova, a Saint Sebastian, and an Eve by Cristoforo Solari, charming in its sensual grace, which is somewhat surprising in such a place.

MILAN

From the roof one has a noble prospect of the Alps, the Apennines, and the plains of Lombardy. In the distance are seen the white and black courses of the church at Monza, where is preserved the famous iron crown which Napoleon placed on his own head when he was crowned King of Italy, saying at the same time: "God has given it to me. Woe to him who touches it!" The crown is of gold and precious stones like every other crown, and owes its name to a small iron band which encloses it, and which, it is claimed, is forged out of a nail of the true cross, so that it is at once a jewel and a relic. A special permit is needed to see it since it acquired additional value by being placed upon Napoleon's august brow, but an accurate copy is exhibited.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The ascent of the open-worked spire is in no wise perilous, although it is likely to alarm people subject to vertigo. The light stairs wind in the turrets and lead to a balcony above which there is only the pyramidion of the spire and the statue which crowns the building.

I shall not try to describe in greater detail this gigantic basilica; it would take a whole volume; I shall be satisfied, as a mere artist, with its general aspect and a surprising impression. On returning to the street and walking around the church, one notices on the lateral façades and on the apse the same multitude of statues and bassi-relievi. It is like a mad orgy of sculpture, an incredible heaping up of wonders.

Around the cathedral thrive all sorts of small trades, — second-hand book-stalls, open-air opticians, and even a marionette show ; human life with its triviality moves and swarms at the foot of the majestic edifice ; there is always the same contrast between the sublime idea and the coarse fact ; the temple of the Lord casts its shadow upon a Punchinello show.

M I L A N

TRAVELS IN ITALY

THE LAST SUPPER — VERONA

THE next day my first visit was to Santa Maria delle Grazie, the beautiful church attributed to Bramante, built of brick which shows like a rosy flush through the plaster-work broken in many places, and gives to the building, although greatly out of repair, an appearance of life and youth. The side chapels are adorned with frescoes representing tortures. Over the door of one of these chapels are two bronze medallions representing the Virgin and Christ, most unctuous in expression and delicate in workmanship. The low vault, the marble overlaying, the faceted mirrors, the crystals which decorate them are quite in the Spanish taste, and I saw a chapel exactly like that in the Convent of Santa Monica at Cordova.

Leaving the church by the sacristy, the ceiling of which is covered with gilded stars, one enters the cloister of the convent. War dwells in the antique refuge of peace; soldiers, the monks of violence, have replaced the monks, the solitaries of peace. A monastery is easily turned into a barracks; regiments and religious communities, solitary multitudes, are alike in one respect, — they have no family. The pavement of the long arcades, which echoed formerly to the monotonous sound of sandals, now re-echoes to the grounding of arms; drums beat where bells tinkled, oaths break out where prayers were whispered, brutal military life spreads through the courtyards; everywhere are gun limbers, racks of arms, cooking-utensils and victuals, — the disciplined disorder of a camp. Along the walls, worn by the weather, carelessness, or the impious coarseness of the soldiery, are yet to be discerned paintings representing the miracles of the founder of the order, constantly occupied in repelling the temptations of the devil, who appears to him sometimes in the shape of a cat, sometimes in that of a monkey, or better still, under the features of a lovely woman.

THE LAST SUPPER—VERONA

Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper" is on the wall at the end of the refectory; on the opposite wall is a "Crucifixion" by Montorfano, bearing the date of 1495. The painting is good, but who can stand up by the side of Leonardo da Vinci?

Undoubtedly the state of decay of this masterpiece of human genius is most regrettable, yet it is not as hurtful as might be supposed. Leonardo da Vinci is, above all, the painter of mystery, of the inexpressible, of twilight; his paintings recall musical compositions in the minor key. His shadows are veils which he half draws aside, or thickens so that the spectator shall guess at the secret thought; the tones of his colouring are deadened like the colours of objects in the moonlight, the contours are softened and mellowed as if veiled by black gauze, and time, which diminishes the beauty of other paintings, adds to that of Leonardo's work by increasing the harmonious obscurity in which he loves to dwell.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The first impression made by this marvellous fresco has something dream-like about it. All trace of art has disappeared; the fresco seems to float on the surface of the wall which absorbs it as if it were a light mist. It is the shadow of a painting, the ghost of a masterpiece. The effect produced is perhaps more solemn and religious than if the painting itself were living; the body has disappeared, but the soul survives.

Christ is at the centre of the table, having on his right Saint John, the well-beloved Apostle, who, in an attitude of adoration, with gentle, attentive look, half-opened lips and silent mien, bends respectfully and affectionately as if pressing his heart upon the Divine Master. Leonardo has given the Apostles strongly marked, rude faces, for the Apostles were all fishermen, workmen, and men of the people. The vigour of their features denotes the power of the muscles, and shows that they belong to the new-born Church. John, with his feminine face, his delicate features, his fine and exquisite complexion, seems to be an angel rather than a man; he is more ethereal than terrestrial, more poetic than dramatic, more of a lover than of a believer; he symbolises the transition between the human and the divine. Christ bears imprinted on His face the ineffable gentleness of the voluntary victim; the azure of paradise shines in His eyes, and the words of peace and consolation fall from His lips like the celestial manna in the desert. The tender blue of His glance, His pallid complexion,—a reflection of which seems to have fallen upon the Charles I by Van Dyck,—reveal the sufferings of the inner cross borne with trustful resignation; He has resolutely accepted His end, and does not turn away from the bitter cup in that last supper. In that face of incomparable suavity one recognises the wholly moral hero whose soul is his strength. The port of the head, the fineness of the skin, the delicately robust joints, the clean form of the fingers, everything denotes an aristocratic nature amid the plebeian and rustic faces of his companions. Jesus Christ is the Son of God, but He belongs also to the race of the Kings of Judah. Did not a purely spiritual religion require a gentle, noble, purely spiritual leader whom little children might approach without fear? In place of Jesus put Socrates, and the character of that supreme scene is immediately modified. The one will ask that a cock be sacrificed to Æsculapius; the other will offer Himself for victim. The beauty of Greek art is here surpassed by the serenity of Christian art.

THE LAST SUPPER—VERONA

TRAVELS IN ITALY

I might have remained many days longer in Milan and visited the sixteen Corinthian columns of San Lorenzo, the great hospital of Beljioso, and many a splendid and beautiful church; but I make it a practice to seek nothing after a profound impression, and nothing could surpass Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper." Besides, Venice attracted me irresistibly.

I traversed Brescia by night; from Brescia to Verona there is nothing worth mentioning save a glimpse of Lago di Garda near Peschiera; for like the gods of Homer I travelled in a cloud — of dust. The first aspect of Verona — the name of which inevitably recalls Romeo and Juliet, whom Shakespeare's genius has made two real beings that history would willingly believe in — is very picturesque. The road follows for a time the Adige, which is crossed by a great, curious bridge of red brick with immense arches, parapets with Moorish crenellations recalling those of the walls of Seville, and steps which prevent carriages from crossing over. Red towers with dentellated summits break the sky line very happily, and a splendid antique gateway, composed of two orders of superimposed pillars and arcades, majestically receives the pilgrims.

THE LAST SUPPER—VERONA

The Capulets and Montagues might even now quarrel in the streets of Verona, and Tybalt slay Mercutio, for the scene is unchanged. Shakespeare's tragedy is wonderfully accurate. At Verona, as in a Spanish city, every house has a balcony from which may be suspended a silken ladder. Few cities have better preserved their mediæval characteristics. The Gothic arches, the trefoiled windows, the traceried balconies, the pillared houses, the carvings on the corners of the streets, the great mansions with their bronze knockers and their richly wrought gratings, their entablatures surmounted by statues and full of architectural detail which the pencil alone can reproduce take you back to past times and induce a feeling of surprise at the sight of modern costumes and Austrian Uhlans in the streets.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

This sensation is particularly strong on the market-square, which is filled with watermelons, citrons, limes, and tomatoes. The houses, covered with frescoes by Paolo Albasini, with their projecting balconies, their sculptured ornaments, their robust columns, have a most Romanesque appearance. Pillars with intricate capitals give the finishing touch to this square, which is full of admirable subjects for water-colour painters and decorators. It is the most animated part of the city ; women are seen at every window, on every doorstep, and the crowd swarms between the stalls of the dealers.

The short time at my disposal compelling me to choose between the apocryphal tomb of Juliet, a sort of trough of reddish marble half-buried in a garden, the tombs of the Scaligers in the open street, and the Roman Amphitheatre, I selected the latter, which is better preserved than even the Arles amphitheatre. The great arena lacks only the outer wall, five or six arches of which remaining intact would make the restoration of the remainder exceedingly easy. A few weeks' labour would allow of the reproduction within its bounds of the bloody games of the circus. It is easy to recognise the stalls of the belluaria and the wild beasts, the entrances and exits for the actors and for the spectators, and the drain by which the waters used in naval displays were carried away ; all that is lacking is the public. As if to give an opportunity to compare modern mediocrity with the grandeur of antiquity, a theatre of wooden boards has been built within the arena. It encloses but a few of the benches, while twenty-two thousand people could sit down comfortably in the Roman amphitheatre.

THE LAST SUPPER—VERONA

TRAVELS IN ITALY

VENICE

I AM somewhat ashamed of the Italian sky, which in Paris we always believed to be of an unchanging blue, for when I left Verona great black clouds were rising on the horizon. It is a pity to begin a trip to a country of sunshine by descriptions of storms, but truth compels me to confess that rain was falling heavily, first in the distance, then on the middle distance of the country through which I was travelling by rail. The background of the picture was composed of cloud-capped mountains and hills, on which rose mansions and country homes; the foreground was formed of very green, very vivid, and very picturesque cultivated fields. The vine is not planted in Italy as it is in France; it is trained to climb in the form of arbours and to wind upon poles on which its foliage hangs in festoons. Nothing can be more graceful than these long rows of trees which, connected with each other by the tendrils of the vine, seem to hold each others' hands and to dance a great farandola around the fields. They look like a chorus of vegetable Bacchantes which delight to celebrate in autumn the ancient festival of Lyæus. These vine-tendrils passing from branch to branch impart a wonderful elegance to the landscape. Here and there open farmhouses allowed one to see labourers enjoying their evening meal under their porticos, and gave life to the picture.

VENICE

The railway passes close to Vicenza and soon reaches Padua, concerning which I can merely repeat the stage directions for the setting of "Angelo": "On the horizon the sky line of mediæval Padua." A tower and a few steeples standing out against a pale strip of sky were all that I could see. The weather did not improve. Blasts of wind, gusts of rain and sudden flashes of lightning pursued us constantly; it was almost cold.

Although the train was running at high speed, it seemed to me, so great was my impatience, that I was travelling on one of the cars drawn by snails seen in Raphael's arabesques. Every man, whether he be a poet or not, makes an ideal home for himself in one or two cities in which he dwells in dreams, inventing the architecture of the palaces, of the streets, of the houses, and the general aspect, much as Piranesi loved to create in his etchings fantastic buildings, possessed, however, of a strong and mysterious reality. What lays the foundations of this intuitive city? It would be difficult to tell. Narrations, engravings, a glimpse of a map, sometimes the euphony or the singularity of the name, a tale read in one's early youth, the merest trifle, — all add to it. For myself three cities have always greatly preoccupied me, Granada, Venice, and Cairo. I was able to compare the real Granada with my own and to sleep in the Alhambra; but life is so ill arranged, it passes in such awkward fashion, that as yet I knew Venice only through the image produced in the camera obscura of my brain, — an image often so deeply imprinted that reality itself finds it difficult to efface it. I was within half an hour of the real Venice, and I, who never wish that a single grain of sand should fall faster in the hour-glass, so sure am I that death will come, — I would willingly have abridged my life by those thirty minutes. As for Cairo, that is quite another matter, — and besides, Gérard de Nerval had seen it in my place.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

In spite of the rain which lashed my face, I bent out of the carriage window in the endeavour to perceive in the shadow the distant loom of Venice, a faint silhouette of a tower, a gleam of light, but the night was becoming darker, and the horizon was impenetrable. At last, at one station, travellers for Mestre were told to alight. It was at Mestre that boats were formerly taken for Venice; now the railway has replaced the gondola; a long bridge crosses the lagoon and connects Venice with the mainland.

VENICE

Never have I felt a stranger impression. The train was entering upon the long causeway. The heavens had the appearance of a dome of basalt rayed with dun rays; on either side the lagoon, of a deeper black than the darkness of night, stretched away into the unknown; from time to time the glare of lightnings revealed the waters in a sudden blaze, and the train seemed to proceed through the void like a hippogriff in a nightmare, for neither the heavens, the water, nor the bridge were visible. It was not the sort of entry into Venice that I had dreamed of, but it was far more fantastic than even Martins' imagination could have devised in the way of mystery, stupendousness, and awe when designing a Babylonian or Ninevite avenue. Storm and night had prepared the picture which the lightning drew in lines of fire, and our locomotive recalled the chariots of fire with wheels of flame that bore the prophets to the seventh heaven.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

To arrive by night in a city which one has dreamed of for many and many a year is not an uncommon occurrence when travelling, but it is calculated to excite curiosity to the point of exasperation. To enter the dwelling of one's dream with bandaged eyes is the most irritating thing imaginable. I had already experienced this at Granada, into which I was conveyed by stage-coach at two o'clock in the morning in Cimmerian darkness. The gondola into which I had got on leaving the train, proceeded first along a very broad canal, on the banks of which loomed faintly dark buildings starred with a few lighted windows and lanterns which cast long, quivering beams of light on the black, rippling water. Then it entered narrow waterways with exceedingly complicated turns. The storm which was passing away still lighted the heavens with livid gleams, which enabled me to catch a glimpse of long perspectives and of strange outlines of unknown palaces. We passed under bridges, the two ends of which made a break in the compact, sombre mass of houses. At some of the corners the faint light of a lamp flickered before a Madonna. Curious guttural cries sounded at the turns of the canals ; a gliding coffin with a bending shadow at one end, passed rapidly by ; a low window, close to which we swept, gave us a glimpse of an interior lighted by a lamp or reflected light, recalling Rembrandt's etchings ; doors, the threshold of which was lapped by the waters, gave passage to mysterious figures that vanished at once ; staircases dipped into the canal and seemed to rise through the shadow towards mysterious Babels ; the striped posts to which the gondolas are made fast in front of the sombre façades looked like spectres. On the bridges faint human shapes, like wan figures in a dream, watched us pass by. Sometimes every light disappeared, and we proceeded in sinister fashion amid four kinds of darkness : the oily, dank, deep darkness of the waters, the tempestuous darkness of the night sky, and the opaque darkness of the two walls, on one of which the gondola's lantern cast reddish gleams which showed pedestals, shafts of pillars, porticos, and gratings that disappeared forthwith.

VENICE

Every object on which fell in this darkness a stray beam of light, assumed mysterious, fantastic, terrifying and exaggerated proportions. The water, always so awesome at night, increased the effect by its low rippling, its universality, and its restlessness. The gleam of the few lamps cast long, bloodlike trails upon it, and its dense mass, black as Cocytus, seemed to stretch its complacent mantle over crimes untold. It surprised me not to hear the fall of a dead body hurled from a balcony or a half-opened door. Never was reality more unreal than that on that evening; I seemed to be living in a novel of Maturin's or Lewis' or Anne Radcliffe's illustrated by Goya, Piranesi, or Rembrandt; the old stories of the Three Inquisitors, of the Council of Ten, of the Bridge of Sighs, the Wells and the Leads, of executions on the Orfano Canal, of the melodramatic and the Romanticist stage-setting of old Venice, came back to my memory in spite of myself, made more sombre still by reminiscences of "The Confessional of the Black Penitents" and "Abellino, or The Great Bandit." I was filled with terror, cold, dank, and dark as all around, and I involuntarily thought of Malipiero's speech to Tisbé when he depicts the terror the name of Venice fills him with. This impression is absolutely accurate, though it may seem exaggerated, and I think that even the most positive Philistine would find it difficult to avoid it. I will go further and say that it is the true meaning of Venice, which emerges at night out of modern transformations, — Venice, a city which seems to have been built by a scene painter, and the manners and customs of which seem to have been arranged by a dramatic author, for the purpose of making plots and dénouements more interesting. Darkness restores the mystery which it loses in the daylight, puts on its commonplace inhabitants the mask and domino of old days, and imparts to the most ordinary motions of life a look of intrigue and crime. Every door that half opens seems to give egress to a lover or a bravo, every gondola which glides by silently must surely bear away a couple of lovers or a dead body with a broken stiletto planted in its heart.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

VENICE

At last our craft stopped at the foot of a marble staircase, the lower steps of which were bathed by the sea, in front of a façade every window of which was lighted up. We had reached the former Palazzo Giustiniani, now transformed into a hotel, as is the case with several other Venetian palaces. Half a dozen gondolas lay in front of the door like carriages awaiting their owners. A great monumental staircase led to the upper stories, on each of which was a long hall and side apartments looking out on the canal and on the mainland.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

While awaiting supper, I leaned on the balcony ornamented with marble columns and Moorish arches. The rain had stopped; the clear, well-washed sky was brilliant; the stars of the Milky Way showed against the darker azure like unnumbered millions of white spots, and numerous meteors rayed the horizon with their swiftly vanishing trail of light. A few brilliant points, stars upon earth, shone on the other bank, which was partially revealed; the faint outline of a dome showed on my right on the opposite side of the canal, and as I bent forward, I discovered on the left a blazing line of lights, which I imagined must be the lamps on the Piazzetta. Other sparks of light, like those which dot burnt paper, wound about on the dark background. These were the lanterns of gondolas going and coming.

The next morning my first impulse was to run to the balcony. I was at the entrance to the Grand Canal, opposite the Dogana, a handsome edifice with columns in the Rustic order, adorned with bosses and supporting a square tower ending in two Hercules kneeling back to back and bearing upon their robust shoulders a globe upon which turns a nude figure of Fortune, bald behind and with long hair in front, holding back with its hands the two ends of a veil which forms a vane and yields to the slightest breath of wind; for this figure is hollow like the Giralda at Seville. Near the Dogana rose the white dome of Santa Maria della Salute, with its volutes, its pentagonal staircase, and its wealth of statues. I at once recognised the Salute from the beautiful painting by Canaletto in the Louvre. In the background I caught sight of the Giudecca Point and the island of San Giorgio Maggiore, on which, above the Austrian battery, rises Palladio's church with its Greek façade, its Oriental dome, and its Venetian belfry of the brightest rose. There was a swimming bath at the mouth of the canal, and numerous craft of varying tonnage, from the fishing-boat to the steamer and the full-rigged ship, the spars and rigging of which were outlined against the serene blue of the morning. The boats which bring provisions to the city were coming up under sail or propelled by oars. It was a beautiful picture, as bright as that of the previous evening was sombre.

VENICE

It is difficult for a stranger to traverse Venice on foot, so my first care was to hire a gondola. Although this craft has been worked to death in comic operas, songs, and tales, that is no reason why it should not be better known. It is the natural product of Venice, an animated being with its particular local life, a sort of fish which can exist only in the waters of a canal; the lagoon and the gondola are inseparable; they complete each other. Venice is impossible without the gondola; the craft is narrow and long, turned up at the two ends, drawing but little water; in general outline it resembles a skate. The prow is provided with a flat, polished piece of iron which has a distant resemblance to the neck of a swan, or rather, to the handle of a violin with its keys. Six teeth, the interstices of which are sometimes adorned with open-work, help out the resemblance. This piece of iron is an ornament, a defence, and a counterweight, the boat being more heavily trimmed aft. By the rail of the gondola, near the bow and the stern, are two pieces of wood shaped like ox-yokes on which the gondolier leans his oar, he himself standing on a low platform with his heel set against a chock. The whole boat is tarred or painted black; the floor is brightened with a more or less rich carpet; in the centre is placed a cabin, or felze, which can easily be removed when it is desired to substitute an awning,—a piece of modern degeneracy which makes every good Venetian groan. The felze is hung with black cloth and provided with two soft cushions of morocco leather of the same colour, with sloping backs. In addition there are two folding seats on either side, so that four people can be accommodated. On each side of the cabin is cut a window, usually left open, but which may be closed in one of three ways : first, by a plate of Venetian glass bevelled or with a framework of flowers engraved on the glass ; secondly, by a blind with movable slats so that one can see without being seen ; and thirdly, by a curtain, over which, if one desires more privacy, may be dropped the hangings of the felze. These three different blinds slide along a groove. The door, which one has to enter backwards, for it would be difficult to turn in the narrow space, has only a window and a shutter. The wooden part of the door is carved with greater or less richness according to the means of the owner or the taste of the gondolier. On the left side of the casing of the door shines a copper shield surmounted by a coronet, on which the owner engraves his coat of arms or his monogram ; above there is a small glazed frame which opens from within and which holds the image of the personage to whom the owner or the gondolier is especially devoted, — the

TRAVELS IN ITALY

VENICE

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Blessed Virgin, Saint Mark, Saint Theodore, or Saint George. It is on that side also, but still lower, that the lantern is hung, a custom which is beginning to disappear, for many gondolas travel without their star in front. The left is the place of honour, on account of the coat of arms, the saint, and the lantern ; it is the seat taken by ladies, aged persons, and distinguished personages. At the back a movable panel affords communication with the gondolier posted at the stern. He it is who steers the craft, his sweep being used at one and the same time as a sweep and as a rudder. Two silk cords help you to rise when you want to go out, for you are seated very low. The cloth hangings of the felze are adorned on the inside with tassels of silk not unlike those on priests' hats, and when you desire to shut yourself up completely, the cloth covers up the back of the cabin like the pall upon a coffin. To complete the description, I must add that the inside of the rail is adorned with white arabesques upon a black background. The general appearance is certainly not cheerful, and yet, if we are to believe Byron's Beppo, there occur inside these black gondolas scenes as comical as in the carriages at a funeral. Madame Malibran, who disliked greatly to enter these small catafalques, tried, but unsuccessfully, to have the colour changed. It seems gloomy to us, but it does not strike Venetians in this way, for they are accustomed to the use of black by the sumptuary laws of their old republic, and with them the hearses and palls and the undertakers wore red.

VENICE

I had chosen a gondola with two men. The steersman, tanned by the sun, with his little Venetian cap on the back of his head, a thick collar of tawny beard, sleeves rolled up, white trousers and belt, fully recalled his former prototypes. The one in the bow, much more of a modern dandy, wore a cap, from below which showed a lovelock; a striped cotton jacket, and modern trousers, and thus united in his person the gondolier and the guide. As it was fine, an awning with blue and white stripes had, much to my regret, taken the place of the felze, under which I would willingly have stifled with heat through sheer love of local colour.

I gave directions to be taken at once to the Piazza San Marco. As we pushed off, I had an opportunity to observe the façade of the hotel, which was really splendid, with its three stories of balconies, its Moorish windows, and its slender marble columns. But for a wretched sign placed over the portico and bearing the words, "Hôtel de l'Europe, chez Marseille," the Palazzo Giustiniani would have looked exactly as it does on Albert Dürer's superb plan, save for the two windows on the third story cut by the side of the original bay, which is still visible in the wall; and the former owners, if they were to return from the other world in the gondola of Charon, the boatman of Hades, would easily find their dwelling on the Grand Canal, still intact, though dishonoured. It is a peculiarity of Venice that, although its drama has come to an end, the setting of the past has remained in its place.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The gondoliers row standing, bending over their oars. One wonders that they do not constantly fall into the water, for the whole weight of their bodies bears forward. Long habit gives them the skill needed to preserve that attitude; during their apprenticeship they must tumble over more than once. They are wonderfully clever in avoiding collisions, in shaving corners, coming alongside traghetti (ferry landings) or steps. The gondola answers the helm so quickly that it seems to be a living being.

A few strokes of the sweeps soon brought me to one of the most marvellous prospects which the human eye can behold,—the Piazzetta seen from the sea. Standing in the bow of the motionless gondola, I gazed for some time in mute ecstasy upon that unrivalled picture, the only one, perhaps, that imagination cannot surpass. On the left, looking from seaward, the trees in the Royal Garden form a green line above the white terraces; next come the Zecca (or Mint), and the old Library, the work of Sansovino, with its elegant arches and its crown of mythological statues; on the right, separated by a space which forms the Piazzetta—the vestibule to the Piazza San Marco—the Palace of the Doges shows its golden façade with its diaper of rose and white marble, its massive pillars, supporting a gallery of slender columns, the ribbing of which contains quatrefoils, with six ogival windows, a monumental balcony enriched with brackets, niches, finials, statues, and surmounted by a statue of the Virgin; its acroter, the acanthus leaves of which alternate against the sky with a spiral fillet, which runs up the angles and ends in traceried pinnacles. At the back of the Piazzetta towards the Library rises to a prodigious height the Campanile, a great brick tower with high-pitched roof surmounted by a golden angel. Near the Palace of the Doges is seen a corner of the peristyle of

VENICE

TRAVELS IN ITALY

San Marco which faces on the Piazza. The prospect is closed by the Procuratie Vecchie and the Clock Tower with its bronze jacks, its lion of St. Mark on a starry blue ground, and its great azure dial on which are marked the twenty-four hours.

In the foreground, opposite the landing-place for gondolas, between the Library and the Palace of the Doges, rise two huge, monolithic columns of African granite, formerly rose-coloured, but now washed with cooler tones by rain and weather. On the left one, as viewed from the sea, stands in a triumphant attitude, his brow encircled by a metal halo, sword by his side, lance in hand, leaning upon his shield, a Saint Theodore of splendid port trampling a crocodile under foot; on the right hand one, the Lion of Saint Mark in bronze, wings displayed, lips turned back, one paw on the Gospel, turning its back to Saint Theodore's crocodile with the fiercest and grimmest look that a heraldic animal can have. The two monsters appear to be determined not to be good company.

It is said to be unlucky to land between the two columns, where formerly executions took place, and I requested the gondolier, when landing me, to do so at the staircase on the Zecca or at the Ponte della Paglia

VENICE

(Bridge of Straws), not caring in the least to end like Marino Faliero, who came to grief because a storm had thrown him at the foot of these formidable pillars. Beyond the Palace of the Doges is seen the New Prison, with which it is connected by the Bridge of Sighs, a sort of cenotaph suspended over the Canal della Paglia; then a curving line of palaces, houses, churches, buildings of all kinds which forms the Riva degli Schiavoni (Quay of the Slavonians) and which ends in the green masses of the Public Garden on the point which stretches into the sea. Near the Zecca debouches the Grand Canal and rises the Dogana di Mare, which, with the public Garden, forms the two ends of that panoramic curve along which Venice stretches like a marine Venus.

I have noted as accurately as I could the principal features of the picture, but what should be rendered is the effect, the colour, the mass, the shimmer of air and water, the life. How can I express the rosy tones of the Palace of the Doges which seems like lovely flesh, the snowy whiteness of the statues, the contours of which show against the azure of Veronese and Titian, the glow of the Campanile caressed by the sun, the flash of the distant gilding, the innumerable aspects of the sea, sometimes transparent as a mirror, sometimes sparkling like a dancer's skirt? Who can paint the infinite, luminous atmosphere full of beams and of haze, with its sunshine and clouds; the coming and going of gondolas, of boats, of argosils, of galliots, the red and the white sails, the vessels with their cutwaters touching the quays, with their innumerable picturesque details of flags, nets, and lines hung up to dry; sailors loading and unloading ships, boxes carried out, barrels rolled along; the varied, many-coloured people on the quays, Dalmatians, Greeks, Levantines, and others whom Canaletti would mark with a single touch? How can I show all this at once, as in nature, when I am compelled to name one thing after another? For the poet, less fortunate than the painter and the musician, can use but a single line; the former has his whole palette, the second his whole orchestra.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The landing-place at the Piazzetta is adorned with Gothic lanterns, ornamented with figures of saints and planted on posts that rise out of the water. One of these lanterns was presented by the Duchess of Berry. Gondolas crowd at this fairy landing, which is the most frequented of all. In order to reach the shore, the axe-head of the gondola has to be used like a wedge in order to divide the clustering mass. When you land, numbers of old and young ragged beggars hasten up provided with sticks with a nail at the end, with which they hook the boat as with a boat-hook and steady it while you set foot on shore, an operation which at first is somewhat difficult in consequence of the extreme crankiness of the frail craft. It is well understood, of course, that this anxious care is not intended to prevent your falling in or wetting your feet on a lower step. A dirty hand or a filthy cap, humbly outstretched, invites you to drop in an Austrian penny or cent as a recompense for the service done.

VENICE

On the bases of the two columns are seated gondoliers waiting for customers, mendicants, half-naked children who seek a living on the streets of Venice, — a whole Picaresque population that worships sunshine and far niente. Formerly the bases of the columns were adorned with sculptures, now, alas! worn away by constant rubbing. They appear to have been intended to represent figures holding fruits and foliage. Saint Theodore's pillar leans somewhat towards the Library, that of the Lion of Saint Mark towards the Palace of the Doges. The Piazzetta façade of the Palace of the Doges is similar to that on the water side. It has, like the latter, a great window, whence Manin, when resigning the provisional government after the capitulation of Venice in 1849, harangued the people for the last time. At the end of the façade is the Piazza, which lies at right angles to it and, as its name indicates, is very much larger.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The four sides of the Piazza are formed by the façade of the Basilica of San Marco, situated near the Palace of the Doges, the Clock Tower, the Procuratie Vecchie and the Procuratie Nueve, which are companion buildings, and an ugly modern palace in the classical taste, stupidly built in 1809 to provide a Throne Room, in the place of the charming church of San Germiniano, the elegant style of which corresponded so well with that of the Basilica. The Campanile, adorned at its base by a charming little building by Sansovino, called the Loggetta, stands alone at the corner of the Procuratie Nueve. On nearly the same line are planted the three flag-staffs from which formerly flew the standards of the Republic.

From the end of the square the prospect is fairylike and dazzling, however well prepared one may be by paintings and descriptions. There stands San Marco, with its five cupolas, its porticos brilliant with mosaics and golden pigments, its traceried finials, its immense stained-glass window, in front of which rear the four horses of Lysippus, its gallery of slender columns, its winged lion, its ogee gables with their fleurons of foliage that bear statues, its pillars of porphyry and antique marbles, its triple aspect of temple, basilica, and mosque ; a strange and mysterious, exquisite and barbaric building, an immense heaping up of riches, a pirates' church formed of pieces stolen or won from every civilisation.

VENICE

A brilliant light made the great Evangelist shine again under his starry sky, the mosaics sparkled, the silvery gray cupolas showed like the domes of Saint Sophia's in Constantinople, and flocks of doves flew constantly from the cornices of the balustrades and lighted fearlessly on the square. It seemed to be an Oriental dream turned to stone by the might of some enchanter, a Moorish church or Christian mosque built by a converted Caliph.

Like the Seville Giralda, the Campanile has no stairs. It is ascended by a slope up which one could ride, so gentle is it. The interior is formed of a brick, cage-like structure, with long openings, around which winds the slope. At every pillar a small loophole, cut out of one of the faces of the tower, admits sufficient light. After a long climb you reach the platform on which are the bells. Red and green marble columns support four arches, one on each face of the Campanile, which allow the eye to wander over the whole extent of the horizon. A spiral staircase enables the sight-seer to ascend still higher up to the foot of the gilded angel, but it is useless fatigue to do so, for the whole panorama of Venice is easily seen from the lower platform.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Leaning on the balcony and looking below and seaward, is seen, first, the roof of Sansovino's Library, covered with Venuses, Neptunes, Mars, and other allegorical figures. It is now the Royal Palace. Next comes the roof of the Palace of the Doges, covered with sheets of lead. The glance reaches down into the court of the Zecca, and the Piazzetta, with its pillars and gondolas, shows its pavement divided into compartments ; beyond is the sea, studded with islands and vessels.

San Giorgio Maggiore, with its red steeple, its two white bastions, its basin, its girdle of vessels attracted by the Porto Franco, lies in the foreground. It is separated from the Giudecca by a canal. The Giudecca, the maritime suburb of Venice, with its line of houses towards the city, and its girdle of gardens towards the sea, has two churches, Santa Maria and Il Redentore, the white cupola of which shelters a Capuchin convent. Beyond San Giorgio are seen the Sanita, a small island, San Servolo, with the lunatic asylum, and finally the Lido, a barren, sandy shore, which, with the long, narrow, low spit of land called Malamocco, forms the rampart of Venice against the waters of the Adriatic.

VENICE

Behind the Giudecca, farther and farther on the horizon, show against the blue sea the Grazia, San Clemente, the place of penitence and imprisonment for priests, Poveglia, the quarantine station, and beyond the Malamocco line, almost invisible in the glinting of the waters, the little island of San Pietro. The eye recognises these islands by one of the tall Venetian towers, of which the Campanile seems to be the prototype.

Over all this sea there is an infinite coming and going of vessels, gondolas, and crafts of all kinds. Lines of posts mark along the lagoon the special channels, for the usual depth is not more than three or four feet. Beyond, the eye is lost in the great stretch of azure which might be mistaken for the sky, did not a sail gilded by a sunbeam undeceive you. The transparency of the sky, the limpidity of the water, the brilliancy of the light, the clearness of the outlines, the depth and

If one turns towards the back of the Piazza, the prospect is equally varied. First there is the continuation of the Giudecca, the Dogana, with its wild-haired Fortune, the Salute, with its double dome; the entrance to the Grand Canal which, in spite of its breadth, soon disappears between the houses; San Moisè and its steeple, joined to the church by a bridge; Santo Stefano, with its brick tower surmounted by a statue on a crescent; the great red church of Santa Maria Gloriosa dei Frari, the high pitched arch of which shows above the roofs; the black cupola of San Simeone Piccolo, the only one of this colour in Venice, because instead of being roofed with lead, it is roofed with copper, producing amid the silver coverings of the other churches the same effect as the armour of mysterious knights in mediæval tournaments. Then at the extremity of the still invisible canal, San Geremia, the dome and tower of which were struck by cannon-balls during the siege. Behind San Geremia show the green trees of the Botanical Gardens, and close to the railway station the Scalzi exhibit their façade, almost concealed by scaffolding.

VENICE

Between these churches, which rise above ordinary buildings like the idea which gave them birth, spreads a swelling ocean of heaving roofs and tumbled tiles, and spring thousands of round, square, turban-shaped, turreted chimneys, and others swelling out like flower-pots, of the strangest and most unexpected shapes. Cut out some façade or some corner of a palace, standing out from the crowd of houses, and you have a foreground bathed in a warm, clear, golden light, which brings out wondrously the delicate blue of the sea, which you behold above the roofs, marked only by two islands, San Angelo del Polvere and San Giorgio in Alga.

On the far horizon the Euganean Mountains, a branch of the Friuli Alps, form a wavy, azure outline. At the foot of the mountains, broad green strips denote the rich cultivated land of the main, and Padua shows against the sky line, softened by the distance. An ashy-coloured shore, laved probably by the tide, — for there is an ebb and flow in the Adriatic, though none in the Mediterranean, — forms a transition and a gradation between the land and the water. The railway bridge, easily seen from this height, crosses the lagoon, connects Venice with the mainland, and turns the island into a peninsula. Fusina and Mestre lie outside, the first to the left, the second to the right of the railway.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The third arch of the Campanile, looking towards the Clock Tower, frames in Santa Maria del' Orto, the tall red belfry and high, tiled roof of which are distinctly seen; Santi Apostoli with their lofty white turret adorned with a dial and a cross on a globe; the Gesuiti, with the mannered and tawdry statues of the façade showing against the blue of the sea; and then the usual accompaniment of chimneys and roofs. It is remarkable that nowhere is a trace of a canal to be seen; the cuts which these waterways should make amid the islands of houses are not even suspected. The whole prospect forms a compact block, a petrified tempest of tiles and roofs, upon which the churches show like vessels at anchor.

Turning somewhat towards the right, the glance falls upon the bell-turret of the great cupola of Santi Giovanni e Paolo, a great brick building; the elegant tower of Santa Maria Formosa, which makes a white mark upon the tawny tints of the picture; and, beyond, the island of San Segundo, a little sea-girt fort; in the distance the cemetery, with its rose-coloured walls, marked by two churches, San Cristoforo and San Michele, a green spot studded with black crosses. In the same direction, near the centre of the lagoon, Murano, where was manufactured the Venice glass which still adorns many a sideboard, attracts the glance by the red campanile of its church degli Angeli, the roof of San Pietro, and three tall cypresses which rise like dark steeples out of a group of houses and trees.

VENICE

Looking out of the fourth arch of the campanile, beyond the Palace of the Doges, are seen San Francesco della Vigna and its steeple, noticeable for its red panels with their edges of white, San Andrea, and San Zaccaria, whose gray dome surmounted with balls and crosses like the cross of San Marco, and its high façade formed of three rounded gables, rise from the maze of houses. The Arsenal, with its square tower, rose above, white below, its basins of gleaming water, its vast building sheds like the arches of an aqueduct; its pulleys, engines, and its general appearance of storehouse and rope-walk; and farther away, the dome and steeple of San Pietro di Castello, the triangular gable and the spire of Santa Elena.

Towards the open sea show Burano, Mazorbo, and Torcelle, where the first Veneti settled. Owing to the distance, all one can see is a few green, cultivated fields, houses, and three churches, one of which is more discernible than the others; then beyond, sky or water, a white curl of foam, a passing sail, a gull soaring in the blue haze, a bright immensity, the greatest of immensities.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

TRAVELS IN ITALY

SAN MARCO

LIKE the Mosque at Cordova, which it resembles in more than one respect, the Basilica of San Marco has greater superficial area than height, unlike Gothic churches which spring heavenwards with their lancets, their steeples, their finials. The great square cupola is only one hundred and ten feet in height. San Marco has preserved the characteristics of primitive Christianity when, scarce emerged from the catacombs, it sought, not having yet designed a form of art¹ for itself, to build a church with the remains of the temples of antiquity and on the lines of pagan art. Begun in 979 under Doge Pietro Orseolo, the Basilica of San Marco was slowly completed, each century adding some treasure or some beauty; and yet, strange as it may seem and contrary to all ideas of proportion, that agglomeration of pillars, capitals, bassi-relievi, enamels, mosaics, that mingling of the Greek, Roman, Byzantine, Arab, and Gothic styles, forms the most harmonious ensemble.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

This incoherent temple, in which a pagan could find an altar to Neptune, with its dolphins, its tritons, its shells turned into holy-water basins; in which a Mohammedan might believe himself in the Mibrab of his mosque as he beheld the lines inscribed on the vault like sourahs of the Koran; in which the Greek Christian would find his Panagia crowned like an empress of Constantinople, his barbaric Christ with interlaced monogram, the special saints of his own calendar drawn in the manner of Pansolinos and the monkish painters of the holy mountain; in which the Roman Catholic feels that in the shadow of the naves illumined by the dun reflection of the golden mosaics, live and breathe the unshakable faith of early times, submission to dogma and to hieratic forms, the mysterious and deep Christianity of the days of belief; — that church, I repeat, built of contradictory pieces, enchants and caresses the eye more than the most correct and symmetrical architecture could possibly do. Unity springs here from diversity. Semicircular arches, Gothic arches, trefoils, slender pillars, fleurons, cupolas, marble slabs, backgrounds of gold, brilliant colours of mosaics, all combine with the most wondrous success to form the most magnificent monumental bouquet.

SAN MARCO

The façade has five portals giving access to the church, and two leading under the exterior side galleries; in other words, seven openings, three on either side of the great central porch. The central portal is marked by two groups of four columns of porphyry and verd antique on the first story, and six on the second, which support the spring of the semicircular arch. The other porches have two pillars only at each of the two stories. I speak now of the façade only, for the interior of the porches is adorned with numerous other slender columns in cipolin and pentelican marble, jasper, and other costly materials.

Let us examine more particularly the mosaics and ornaments of this wonderful portal. Beginning with the first arch on the sea side, there is, above a square door closed by an iron grating, a Byzantine plating in black and gold in the shape of a reliquary with two angels placed against the moulding of the edge. Above, in the tympanum of the arch, is a great mosaic with a golden background, representing the body of Saint Mark taken from the crypts of Alexandria and smuggled through the Turkish customs between two sides of bacon, the pig being a loathsome animal which the Mussulmans hold in abomination, and contact with

In the second arch is a door not in symmetry with the other. It is surmounted by a window with a triple Gothic arch, between which are two quatrefoils, the whole window surrounded by a border of enamels. The mosaic of the tympanum, which is also on a gold background like all those in San Marco, represents the arrival of the Apostle's body at Venice, where it is received on landing by the clergy and the chief men of the state. The vessel which has brought it and the willow baskets which contained it are also shown. This mosaic is likewise by Pietro Vecchia.

SAN MARCO

A Saint Demetrius, seated, with his sword half-drawn from the sheath, and his name engraved near the head, looking very fierce and very much in the style of the Lower Empire, continues the series of bassi-relievi set within the façade of the basilica as in a museum.

We are now at the central gate, the great portal, the outer arch of which cuts the marble balustrade which runs above the other arches. Very properly it is the richest and the most ornamental. Besides the numerous pillars of antique marble which support it and prove its importance, three wreaths, two on the inside and one on the outside, bring out strongly the form of the arch by their projections. These three garlands of ornaments, carved, wrought, and finished with marvelous patience, are composed of a thick spiral of foliage, scrolls, flowers, fruit, birds, angels, saints, small figures, and chimeras of all kinds. The arabesques in the third wreath spring from the hands of two statues seated one at each end of the spiral. The gates themselves, with their bronze leaves studded with the faces of fantastic animals, are surmounted by a niche with open-worked, trellised, and gilded panels like those of a triptych or a cabinet. The upper portion of the arch is filled by a Last Judgment of great size designed by

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Antonio Zanchi and reproduced in mosaic by Pietro Spagna. This work is of about 1680, and was restored in 1838 in accordance with the original design. The Christ, which somewhat recalls the Christ of Michael Angelo in the Sistine Chapel, is separating the wicked from the good. Near Him stand His divine Mother and His beloved Apostle, Saint John, who appear to be interceding on behalf of the sinners. He leans on His cross, which is supported with respectful solicitude by an angel, while other angels sound their trumps loudly to awaken in their tombs the obstinate sleepers.

It is above this portal, on the gallery which runs around the church, that are placed upon pedestals formed of antique pillars the famous horses which for a brief time adorned the Triumphal Arch of the Carrousel. Opinions are greatly divided on the subject of these horses. Some maintain that they are Roman work of the days of Nero, brought to Constantinople in the fourth century ; others that they are Greek work from the Island of Chios, brought in the fifth century, by order of Theodosius, to Constantinople, where they served to decorate the Hippodrome ; others, again, maintain that these horses are the work of Lysippus. What is quite sure is that they are antiques, and that in the year 1205 Marino Zeno, who was the Venetian Podestate at Constantinople, had them brought from the Hippodrome and sent to Venice. These horses, which are life-size, somewhat short-necked, with hog manes like the horses on the Frieze of the Parthenon, rank among the finest remains of antiquity ; they are historical and true to life, — a rare combination. Their attitudes show that they were harnessed to some triumphal quadriga. The metal of which they are made is no less precious than the form. They are, it is said, of Corinthian bronze, the greenish patina of which shows through the gilding, which time has worn away.

SAN MARCO

The fourth portal is arranged, so far as the lower part goes, like the second. The tympanum of the arch is filled with a mosaic representing the doge, the senators, and patricians of Venice doing homage to the body of Saint Mark stretched upon a reliquary and covered with a brilliant blue drapery. In the corner stands a group of Turks, ashamed that such a treasure should have been smuggled away from them. This mosaic, which is one of the most brilliant in tone, is the work of Leopoldo del Pozzo, from the designs of Sebastian Rizzi, in 1728. It is exceedingly beautiful. One of the senators in a purple dress is worthy of Titian. In the spandrel of the archivolt on the side of the main portal is a Saint George in Greco-Byzantine style, and in the other an angel or some unknown saint.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The fifth portal is one of the most interesting. The lower part contains five small windows with a golden trellis of diverse designs. Above are the four symbolic animals of the Gospel writers in gilded bronze, — the ox, the lion, the eagle, and the angel, — as fantastically designed as Japanese monsters, casting suspicious glances at each other ; while a strange horseman, on a steed which may be Pegasus or the Pale Horse of the Apocalypse, rides between two golden rosettes. The capitals of the pillars are also in a ruder, more archaic and more vigorous taste than any of the others. Higher still, a mosaic, the work of an unknown artist of the twelfth century, contains a most interesting picture, a view of the basilica erected to receive the relics of Saint Mark as it existed eight hundred years ago. The domes, of which three only are visible, and the portals of the façade, are about the same as now ; the horses, recently brought from Constantinople, are already in their places. The centre arch is filled with a great Byzantine Christ with the Greek monogram, and the others with roses, fleurons, and arabesques; the body of the saint, borne shoulder-high by prelates and bishops, is entering into the church dedicated to him. A crowd of figures, among them groups of women dressed in long gowns studded with enamels, dressed as one imagines the Greek empresses must have been, are pressing forward to see the ceremony.

SAN MARCO

The series of contrasting bassi-relievi, the subjects of which I have enumerated, is closed on this side by a Hercules bearing the boar of Calydon and appearing to menace a small grotesque creature half concealed within a barrel. Below this bas-relief are stretched two rampant lions, and lower still an antique figure in high relief holds an amphora upside-down on its shoulder. This theme, no doubt suggested by chance, has been cleverly reproduced in other parts of the edifice.

This row of porches forming the ground story of the façade, is bordered with a balustrade of white marble. The second story has five arches, the centre one of which, larger than the others, rises behind the horses of Lysippus; and in lieu of a mosaic is glazed and adorned with antique pillars.

Six canopies, of four columns each, forming niches for the statues of evangelists, and topped by a pyramidal roof ending in a golden crown and vane, rise between these arcades, the semicircular tympanum of which is enclosed in and surmounted by a Gothic arch. The subjects of the four mosaics represent the Ascension, the Resurrection, Jesus calling Adam and Eve and the patriarchs from limbo, and Luigi Gaetano's Descent from the Cross, from the design of Maffeo Verona in 1617. In the spandrels of the arch are placed nude figures of slaves, life-size, bearing on their shoulders urns and amphoræ which lean over as if the slave sought to pour from above into a basin the water drawn from the fountain. Gutters are fitted to the hollow amphoræ, for the slaves are gargoyles. Their attitudes are very varied and their port is superb. In the ogee of the great central window above the semicircular arch, stands out, on a dark blue background spangled with stars, the Lion of Saint Mark, gilded, with a halo, its wings outspread, its paw upon an open Gospel, upon which are inscribed the words: "Pax tibi, Marce Evangeliste meus." The lion has an apocalyptic and formidable look, and gazes out to sea like a vigilant dragon.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Saint Mark, in human form, rises above the gable and seems to receive the homage of the neighbouring statues. The ogee of each of the five arches is crocketed with great volutes, flowers, rich fleurons in the shape of acanthus leaves, with, by way of a flower, an angel or a saint in adoration. On every gable end there is a statue, — Saint John, Saint George, Saint Theodore, Saint Michael, all of them with a halo.

SAN MARCO

At each end of the balustrade there are two flag-staffs painted red, on which are hoisted the standards on Sundays and feast days. At the corner of the railing on the campanile side is planted a head cut off, in red porphyry.

The side façade, which looks upon the Piazzetta and touches the Palace of the Doges, is worthy of examination. If, in spite of all possible care and accuracy, my description may appear confused, do not blame me very much; it is difficult to depict very methodically so hybrid, composite, and contrasting an edifice as San Marco. From the Porta della Carta, which leads to the Giant Staircase in the court of the Palace of the Doges, the façade of the basilica is covered with slabs of marble, and antique Byzantine and mediæval bassi-relievi, birds, monsters, a net-work of ribbons, animals of all kinds, — lions and wild beasts chasing hares; children half swallowed by dragons which resemble the great serpent of Milan, and holding in their hands cartouches the inscriptions on which are half effaced.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Among the curiosities on this façade are two porphyry figures twice repeated, exactly alike. They represent warriors in very much the costume of Crusaders entering Constantinople, and they are carved in a most primitive and barbarous fashion like the rudest of Gothic bassi-relievi. These porphyry men, their hands on the hilts of their swords, appear to be resolved on some violent deed. The general opinion is that they are Harmodeus and Aristogiton preparing to strike down the tyrant Hipparchus. The learned Cavaliere Mustoxidi believes they represent the four brothers Anemuria, who conspired against Alexander Comnenus, the Emperor of the East; but they may be simply the four sons of Aymon,—that is my opinion. Others, again, maintain that these four porphyry men are two pairs of Saracen robbers, who, having planned to carry off the treasure of Saint Mark, poisoned each other in order to secure the larger share.

It is on this side that are planted separately two huge pillars taken from the church of San Saba at St. Jean d'Acre. They are covered all over with curious ornaments and inscriptions in Cufic characters, almost effaced, the meaning of which has not been fully made out. Somewhat farther, at the corner of the basilica, is a huge block of porphyry in the shape of a broken shaft, with a pedestal and capital of white marble. It was a sort of pillory on which bankrupts were formerly exposed. The custom has fallen into desuetude, but it is rare to see any one sit there, and Venetians, who are so ready to drop down on the nearest pedestal or staircase, appear to avoid it.

SAN MARCO

A bronze gate leading to the Baptistery Chapel fills the first porch. Over it is a columned window with ogee and quatrefoils. Two shields of enamels in brilliant colours, one bearing a cross, and a traceried rose window, complete the decoration of the tympanum. A mosaic representing Saint Vitus in a niche, and an Evangelist holding a book and a pen, are seen in the two lower parts of the arch. A small pediment in the Renaissance taste, and slabs of white marble cut by a green cross fill the second porch. A bench of red Verona brocatello forms at the foot of this sort of miniature façade a comfortable seat for the idler or the dreamer, who, with his feet in the sunshine and his head in the shade, after the fashion of Zafari, is thinking of nothing or of everything while looking at Sansovino's Loggetta at the foot of the Campanile, or at the blue sea and the island of San Giorgio at the end of the façade.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

On the capitals of verd antique which support this arch crouch two apocalyptic monsters, strange shapes seen by Saint John in his hallucinations in the Isle of Patmos. The one, which has a hooked beak like an eagle, holds a small heifer with its legs drawn up under itself; the other, which is half lion and half griffin, has driven its claws into the body of a child thrown cross-wise; one of the claws seems to be putting out the victim's eye. The angle is formed by a detached, squat pillar which bears a shaft of five smaller pillars on its broad capital. In the vaulting of this open portal, covered with a veneer of various marbles, there is a mosaic representing an eagle holding a book in its talons.

The second story shows on the gable arches two finely posed statues of the cardinal virtues: Strength caressing a tame lion, which fawns like a joyous dog, and Fortitude holding a sword with the air of a Bradamante. The sacristan has christened one of these Venice, and the other Queen of Sheba.

SAN MARCO

Incrustations in malachite, various enamels, and two small angels in mosaic holding out the cloth which preserved the impression of the Divine Face; a great, barbaric Madonna presenting her Son to be worshipped by the faithful, flanked by two lamps which are lighted every evening; a bas-relief of peacocks displaying their tails, which comes perhaps from some old temple of Juno; a Saint Christopher bearing his burden; capitals of basket-work most charmingly capricious, — these are the riches which this side of the Basilica offers to the stroller on the Piazzetta.

The other lateral façade looks upon a small square which is the continuation of the Piazza. At the entrance crouch two lions in red marble, cousins-german to those in the Alhambra by the quaint fancifulness of their shapes and the grotesque ferocity of their faces and their manes. They are polished to a wonderful degree, for from time immemorial the little ragamuffins of Venice have spent their days in climbing on top of them and using them as vaulting horses. At the back rises the palace of the Patriarch of Venice, of modern construction, which would be a pretty dull building were it not thrown into the shadow by San Marco; and on the side, the old façade of the church of San Basso.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

This façade is somewhat less ornamented than the other. It is overlaid with discs, mosaics, enamels, ornaments, arabesques, of all times and of all countries, birds, peacocks, curiously shaped eagles like the alerions and martlets of heraldry. The lion of Saint Mark also plays its part in the symbolical menagerie. The tympana of the porches are filled either with small windows surrounded by palms and arabesques, or with incrustations of antique or Byzantine fragments. In the medallions are carved men and animals fighting. A closer examination would no doubt reveal the bull of Mithra struck in the neck by the priest, and thus no religion would be wanting in this artlessly pantheistic temple. Surely this must be Ceres seeking her daughter, a branch of burning pitch pine in each hand by way of a torch, and riding on a car drawn by two bronze dragons. It might be a Hindoo idol, so archaic is the style and so much does it recall the carvings of Persepolis. It is a curious pendant to a Sacrifice of Abraham in bas-relief which must be ascribed to the earliest period of Christian art.

Another bas-relief composed of two lines of sheep, six on either hand, looking at a throne and separated by two palm branches, interested me greatly, for I should have liked to know its meaning. In vain I endeavoured to make out the inscription in Gothic or abbreviated Greek letters which no doubt states the subject. It may be that the sheep are meant for cows; in that case the bas-relief would represent Pharaoh's dream. An antique fragment set in the wall somewhat farther away represents an adept being initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries, and placing a crown upon a mystic palm. This does not prevent Saint George from showing on the archivolt on a throne in the Greek style, and the four Evangelists, Saint Mark, Saint John, Saint Luke, and Saint Matthew, marching along the tympanum, the gables, and the vaulting, either alone or accompanied by their symbolical animals.

SAN MARCO

The portal which opens into that arm of the cross formed by the Basilica, is surrounded by a broad, double moulding, carved and open-worked, presenting a delightful bloom of scrolls and foliage and angels. A lovely Virgin forms the keystone. Above the door rises a horseshoe arch like those of the Mosque at Cordova, an Arab fancy seasonably corrected by a very Christian and pretty Nativity, most devotional in feeling. Beyond that I need mention only a Saint Christopher, apostles, and saints in checkered frames of white and red marble, and a pretty Virgin, seen full face, her hands bent as if in blessing, placed between two angels kneeling in worship.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

I have spoken of a porphyry head placed on the balustrade above the short shaft on which bankrupts were exposed. According to a popular tale, the accuracy of which I do not warrant, Count Carmagnola, after great services done to the Republic, having sought to seize the power for himself, the Council of Ten, conciliating justice and gratitude, had him beheaded, and then erected to his memory a monument which consists of this pedestal and porphyry head, a strange statue from which the body is wanting, and the head of which on the balustrade seems to be exposed as a leader of malefactors is exposed in a cage; but the pillory is San Marco, the sacred place, the Capitol and palladium of Venice. When the hero was tortured to compel him to make the confession needed, according to the ideas of the time, to insure his condemnation, his arms, which had valiantly fought for the state, were spared, and his feet were placed in the fire; a strange mingling of deference and cruelty which is well in harmony with the legend.

The basilica of San Marco is entered, like a temple of antiquity, by an atrium, which anywhere else would be a church. The three red marble slabs in the pavement mark the spot where the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa knelt to the proud Pope Alexander III, saying, "Non tibi, sed Petro," to which the Pope replied, "Et Petro et mihi." How many feet, since the twenty-third day of July, 1177, have worn away the imprint of the knees of the great Emperor, who now rests within the cavern of Kaiserslautern waiting until the crows cease to fly over the mountain. Three bronze doors, incrustated, inlaid, and enamelled with silver, covered with figures and ornaments, and opening into the nave, come, it is said, from Saint Sophia's at Constantinople. One of them is signed Leon de Molina. At the end of the vestibule on the right is seen through a grating the Zeno Chapel with its bronze retable and tomb. The statue of the Virgin, placed between Saint John the Baptist and Saint Peter, is called the Madonna della Scarpe (the Madonna of the Shoe), from the golden shoe on her foot worn away by the kisses of the faithful. This metallic decoration has a curiously severe aspect. The vaulting of the atrium represents, in mosaic, Old Testament subjects: first, for all religious history begins with a cosmogony, the Seven Days of the Creation as told in Genesis, placed in concentric compartments. The archaic barbarity of the style has a wild and primitive mysteriousness which suits the sacred subjects. The stiff drawing is as absolute as dogma, and appears to be rather the hieroglyph of a mystery than a reproduction of nature. This is what gives to these rough Gothic images a power and a commanding look which more perfect works lack. The blue, starry globes, the blue and silver discs which represent the firmament, the sun, and the moon, the many lines which figure the separation between water and land, and that curious personage with impossible gestures, whose right hand creates animals and trees of impossible shape and who bends like a mesmeriser over the first man asleep, the mingling of angular lines and of brilliant tones strike the eye and the mind like an inextricable arabesque and a deep symbolism. The verses of Scripture traced in antique characters, complicated by abbreviations and double letters, add to the hieroglyph a genetic aspect. It is, indeed, a world arising out of chaos. The Tree of the knowledge of good and evil, the Temptation, the Fall, the Expulsion from Paradise, complete the cosmogonic and primitive cycle, the quasi divine period of humanity.

SAN MARCO

TRAVELS IN ITALY

SAN MARCO

Farther on, Cain slays Abel after having seen his own sacrifice rejected by the Lord; Adam and Eve cultivate the ground by the sweat of their brow; the legend "Increase and multiply" is artlessly translated by a pair of lovers. The four columns engaged against the wall above these mosaics are merely ornamental, for they sustain nothing, and are of Oriental white and black marble, exceedingly rare. They were brought from Jerusalem, and tradition holds that they formed part of Solomon's Temple. Assuredly Hiram, the architect, would not think them out of place in San Marco.

In the next arch Noah, in accordance with the commandment of the Lord and in anticipation of the flood, is seen building the Ark, into which are entering two by two all the animals in creation,—an admirable subject for a simple-minded mosaic worker of the fifteenth century. Most curious it is to see outspread upon the golden background the fantastic zoölogy which smacks of heraldry, arabesques, and the signs of travelling menageries. The Flood is most formidable and sombre indeed; it is entirely different from the much bepraised taste of Poussin. The foam of the waves mingles quaintly with the fast falling rain; the raven and the dove coming forth from the Ark, the sacrifice of thanksgiving, — nothing is wanting. That closes the antediluvian cycle. Verses of Scripture which wind in and out everywhere like the inscriptions in the Alhambra and which form part of the ornamentation, explain each phase of the vanished world. The idea is ever side by side with the image; the Word soars everywhere over its plastic representation.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The story, interrupted by the entrance porch, which is adorned with mosaics, the Virgin with archangels and prophets, is continued under the other arches. Noah plants the vine and gets drunk; Japhet, Shem, and Ham, blackened by the paternal curse, go forth, each to found a race of humankind; the Tower of Babel raises to the heavens the artless anachronism of its Byzantine architecture, and calls down on itself the attention of God, annoyed at being so closely approached; the confusion of tongues compels the workmen to give up their work; the human race, which until then was single and spoke the same language, is now about to begin its long pilgrimage through the unknown world in order to recover its title deeds and to reconstitute itself.

The next arches, placed, the first in the vestibule, the others in the gallery opposite the Hall of Lions, contain the story of the Patriarch Abraham in detail, that of Joseph and Moses, with a company of prophets, priests, evangelists, — Isaiah, Jeremiah, Elias, Samuel, Habbakuk, Saint Alipius, Saint Simeon, and innumerable others who are in groups or lines in the arches, in the pendentives, in the keystones, wherever can be placed a figure which cares neither for comfort nor anatomy, and does not mind breaking its arm or leg in order to adorn an out-of-the-way angle.

SAN MARCO

All these biblical legends, full of artless details of curious Oriental fashions, produce a superb and strange effect on the golden background, the brilliancy of which darkens them and brings them out. These old mosaics, probably the work of Greek artists brought from Constantinople, are much more agreeable to me than more modern mosaics which attempt to be pictures; for instance, the one which covers the gallery wall on the San Basso side, below the story of Abraham, and which represents the Judgment of Solomon from cartoons by Salviati. Mosaic, like painting on glass, should not seek to imitate nature. Cleanly drawn, typical forms, plain colours, broad local tones, golden backgrounds, entirely removed from the idea of a painting, — these are suitable to it. A mosaic is opaque stained glass, just as stained glass is transparent mosaic. The palette of the master mosaic-worker is composed of stones, that of the stained-glass painter of gems; neither the one nor the other should seek absolute truth.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

At the end of a gallery, in the tympanum of a door, I greatly admired a Madonna seated on a throne between Saint Peter and Saint John, presenting the Child Jesus to the faithful. It is one of the finest in San Marco. The head, with its great fixed eyes which penetrate you without looking at you, is imperial and imperious in its gentleness. One could swear that Helena or Irene embroidered in Byzantium the cushion on which she rests. The Mother of God, as the Greek monogram calls her, and the Queen of Heaven could not be represented in more majestic fashion. Certain crudities of drawing, which might be considered hieratic, impart to this figure the look of an idol, or an eikon, to make use of the expression of the Greek Christians, which seems to me indispensable for devotional subjects. Under the gallery there are three tombs, one of which, noticeable for its antiquity, represents Jesus Christ and the Twelve Apostles ranged in a row above a line of thuriferæ.

To close the description of the interior of Saint Mark, let us enter the Baptistery, which communicates with the cathedral by a door. The altar is formed of a stone brought from Mount Tabor in 1126 by Doge Domenico Michiele. What the Spaniards call the retable, the Italians la pala, and the French the altar-piece, is here a Baptism of Jesus Christ by Saint John, placed between two angels carved in bas-relief. Saint Theodore and Saint George on horseback are placed on either side, and above there is a great mosaic of the Crucifixion, with the Holy Women, against a background of gold of architectural design. The mosaic in the vaulting represents Jesus Christ in glory, surrounded by a great circle of heads and wings arranged concentrically. It gleams, sparkles, shimmers, flames with a strange impression of whirling; arch-angels, thrones, powers, virtues, principalities, cherubs, and seraphs mingle their oval faces and cross their purple wings so as to form an immense rose, like a Turkish carpet. At the feet of the Almighty writhes Satan in chains, and conquered Death grovels before the triumphant Christ.

SAN MARCO

The next arch, most singular in aspect, exhibits the Twelve Apostles each baptising Gentiles of a different country. The catechumens are, according to the ancient custom, plunged in a basin up to the armpits, and the lack of perspective gives them constrained attitudes and piteous looks which make the baptism resemble a torture. The apostles, with exaggerated eyes and harsh, fierce features, look like executioners and torturers. Four Fathers of the Church, Saint Jerome, Saint Gregory, Saint Augustine, and Saint Ambrose, are placed in the pendentives. The black crosses with which their dalmatics are covered, have a sinister and funereal look. This is, indeed, the general character of the baptistery. The mosaics are of the greatest antiquity. They are the oldest in the church, are ferociously barbarous, and tell of an implacable and savage Christianity.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

In the arch of the vaulting there is a great medallion representing Christ in a most terrible aspect ; no longer the well-known, gentle, fair-haired Christ, the young, blue-eyed Nazarene, but a severe and dread Christ, with a long, gray, wavy beard like that of God the Father, for the Father and the Son are coeternal. Eternal wrinkles mark His brow, and His mouth is contracted, ready to launch anathemas. He seems to despair of the salvation of the world He has saved, or to repent of His sacrifice. Siva, the god of destruction, could not have a more sombre and threatening look in the subterranean pagoda at Ellora. Around this avenging Christ are grouped the prophets who foretold His coming.

SAN MARCO

On the walls is told the story of Saint John the Baptist: the angel announcing to Zacharias the birth of the Precursor; his life in the desert, clad in the rough skins of beasts; the baptism of Christ in the Jordan, a mosaic more Hindoo than Byzantine, and more Caribbean than Hindoo in character, so eccentric is the appearance of the thin body and the waters figured by blue and white stripes; Herodias dancing before Herod; the Beheading of the Baptist and the bringing in of the head upon a silver dish, which was a favorite subject of Juan Valdes. In these latter mosaics Herodias, wearing a long dalmatic edged with vair, recalls the dissolute empresses of Constantinople, the great courtesans of the Lower Empire, — Theodora, for instance, luxurious, lascivious, and cruel. A singular symmetry marks the banquet scene. While Herodias brings in the head on one side, a servant man on the other brings in a pheasant on a dish. Food and murder thus mingled have an artlessly horrible effect. The baptismal font is formed of a basin of marble with a bronze cover, the bassi-relievi on which, modelled in 1545 by Desiderio of Florence and Tiziano of Padua, both pupils of Sansovino, recall the motive of the story of Saint John. The statue of the saint, also in bronze, is by Francesco Segala, and forms an admirable crown to the work. Against the wall is the tomb of Doge Andrea Dandolo.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Let us now enter the Basilica. Above the door is a Saint Mark in Pontifical vestments, from a cartoon of Titian's by the Zuccatto brothers, which suggested to George Sand the subject of a charming novel, "The Master Mosaic Workers." The brilliancy of the mosaic explains why jealous rivals accused the clever artists of having employed paint instead of making use of ordinary means. On the inner impost stands Christ between His Mother and Saint John the Baptist; this mosaic is in good Lower Empire style, imposing and severe.

Nothing can be compared to San Marco in Venice, neither Cologne nor Seville, nor even Cordova with its mosque. The effect is surprising and magical. The first impression one has is of entering a golden cavern studded with gems, splendid and sombre, sparkling and mysterious ; one wonders whether it is within a building or an immense jewelled casket that one stands, for all ideas of architecture are upset. The cupolas, the vaulting, the architraves, the walls, are covered with small tubes of gilded crystal of unchanging brilliancy, made at Murano, on which the light gleams as on the scales of a fish, and which form a background for the inexhaustible fancy of the mosaic workers. Where the golden background stops at the top of the pillars, begins a plating of the most precious and varied marbles. From the vaulting hangs a great lamp in the shape of a four-armed cross with fleurs de lys suspended from a golden ball of filigree work, of marvellous effect when the lights are lighted. Six pillars of wavy alabaster, with gilded bronze capitals in the most fantastic Corinthian style, support elegant arches above which a gallery runs almost entirely around the church. The cupola forms, with the Paraclete as an axle, with palms for spokes, and the Twelve Apostles for the circumference, a vast wheel of mosaics.

SAN MARCO

In the pendentives tall, serious-looking, black-winged angels stand out against a background illumined by gleams of tawny light. The central dome, which rises at the intersection of the arms of the Greek cross which forms the plan of the Basilica, presents within its vast cupola Jesus Christ seated upon a rainbow in the centre of a starry circle supported by two pairs of seraphim. Below him the Divine Mother, standing between two angels, worships her Son in glory; and the Apostles, each supported by a quaint tree, which represents the Garden of Olives, form the celestial court of their Master. The theological and cardinal Virtues are between the columns of the windows of the smaller dome which lights the vaulting. The Four Evangelists, seated under canopies in the shape of castles, are writing their precious books at the base of the pendentives, the extreme point of which is filled with emblematic figures pouring from urns inclined upon their shoulders the four rivers of Paradise, — Pison, Gihon, Tigris, and Euphrates.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

In the next cupola, the centre of which has in a medallion the Mother of God, the four symbolical animals of the Evangelists, in chimerical and astounding attitudes, free for once from the guardianship of their masters, guard the sacred manuscripts with a wealth of teeth, claws, and big eyes which would shame the dragons of the Hesperides. At the end of the apse, which shows dimly behind the high altar, is seen the Redeemer, of gigantic and disproportionate size, made so intentionally, according to the Byzantine custom, to mark the distance between the Divine Person and the weak creature. If that Christ were to rise, he would, like the Olympian Jupiter, break through the roof of the temple.

SAN MARCO

The atrium of the Basilica tells the Old Testament story; the interior tells that of the New Testament in full, with the Apocalypse by way of epilogue. The Basilica of San Marco is a great golden Bible, illustrated, illuminated, adorned, a missal of the Middle Ages on a great scale. For eight centuries past the city has been reading that monument as if it were a book of pictures, and has never wearied of its pious adoration. By the image runs the text. Everywhere ascend, descend, and meander legends in Greek, in Latin, Leonine verse, sentences, names, maxims, specimens of the caligraphy of every country and every age. Everywhere the black letter marks the golden page amid the variety of the mosaics. It is even more the Temple of the Word than the church of Saint Mark; an intellectual temple which, careless of all the orders of architecture, was built with verses of the old and the new faith, and ornamented by the exposition of the doctrine. I wish I could convey the dazzling and bewildering impression caused by that world of angels, apostles, evangelists, prophets, doctors, figures of all kinds, which people the cupolas, the vaulting, the pediments, the arches, the pillars, the pendentives, — every little bit of wall. Here the genealogical tree of the Virgin spreads out its thick branches which have for fruits kings and holy personages, filling a vast panel with its curious bloom; there shines a Paradise, with its glory, its legions of angels and of the blessed. This chapel contains the story of the Virgin; that vaulting contains the drama of the Passion, from the kiss of Judas to the appearance of the Holy Women, not forgetting the Agony in the Garden of Olives and Calvary. All those who have testified to Jesus, either by prophecy, preaching, or martyrdom, have been admitted to this great Christian Pantheon. Here is Saint Peter crucified head down, Saint Paul beheaded, Saint Thomas in the presence of the Indian king Gondoforo, Saint Andrew suffering martyrdom; not a single servant of Christ is forgotten, not even Saint Bacchus. Greek saints whom we Latins know but little of swell this great multitude: Saints Phocas, Dimitri, Procopius, Hermagoras, Euphemia, Dorothea, Erasma, Thekla, all the lovely exotic flowers of the Greek calendar, which may well be painted in accordance with the recipes of the "Manual of Painting" of the monk of Aghia-Labre, bloom on trees of gold and branches of gems.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

SAN MARCO

At certain hours of the day, when the darkness deepens and the sun sheds but a faint light under the vaulting, the poet and the seer behold strange effects. Tawny gleams suddenly flash from the golden background, the small crystal tubes sparkle in spots like the sea in the sunshine, the contours of the figures tremble in the glimmering network, the silhouettes, clearly marked just now, become fainter, and the stiff folds of the dalmatics seem to soften and wave; a mysterious life revives the motionless figures; the staring eyes live, the arms, with their Egyptian gestures, move; the frozen feet begin to walk; the cherubs display their eight wings; the angels exhibit their long azure and purple plumes nailed to the wall by the implacable mosaic worker; the genealogical tree shakes its leaves of green marble; the lion of Saint Mark stretches itself, yawns, and licks its armed paws; the eagle sharpens its beak and ruffles its feathers; the ox turns on its litter and chews the cud; the martyrs rise from their gridirons or descend from their crosses; the prophets converse with the Evangelists, the doctors talk to the young saints, who smile with porphyry lips ; the characters in the mosaics become processions of phantoms which ascend and descend along the walls, move along the galleries, and pass before you in the waving gold of their glory. You are dazzled, bewildered ; you are under the spell of a hallucination. The real meaning of the cathedral, its deep, mysterious, solemn meaning seems then to become plain. It appears to be the temple of a Christianity anterior to Christ, a church built before religion was. The centuries are lost in infinite perspective. Is not the Trinity a trimourta ? Is it Horus or Krishna whom the Virgin holds in her lap ? Is it Isis or Parvati ? Does that figure on the cross suffer the passion of Jesus or the trials of Vishnu ? Are we in Egypt or in India ? — in a temple of Karnak or in a pagoda of Juggernath ? Are these figures in constrained attitudes very different from the processions of coloured hieroglyphs which twist and turn around the pylons and sink in the passages ?

TRAVELS IN ITALY

When the eye descends from the vaulting to the ground, it sees on the left a small chapel dedicated to a miraculous Christ, which, having been struck by a profane hand, shed blood. The dome, supported by columns of excessive rarity, all of which are of black and white porphyry, is closed by a ball formed of the largest agate in the world.

SAN MARCO

At the back extends the choir with its balustrade, its porphyry columns, its row of statues carved by the Massegne brothers, and its great metal cross by Jacopo Benato. It has two pulpits in coloured marble, and an altar which shows under a dais between four columns of green marble carved like Chinese ivory by patient hands, which have inscribed upon it the whole story of the Old Testament in small figures a few inches in height. The altar-piece, called the pala d'oro, is placed within a case, painted in compartments in the style of the Lower Empire. The pala itself is a dazzling mass of enamels, cameos, niello, pearls, garnets, sapphires, gold and silver work, and painting in gems, representing scenes of the life of Saint Mark, surrounded by angels, apostles, and prophets. The pala was made in Constantinople in 976 (1105) and rearranged in 1342 by Giambi Bonsegna. The second or cryptic altar behind the high altar is remarkable only for its four columns of alabaster, two of which are extraordinarily transparent. Near the altar is a wonderful bronze door in which Sansovino set by the side of his own the portraits of his great friends, Titian,

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Palma, and Aretino. The door leads to a sacristy on the vaulting of which blazes a wondrous mosaic in arabesques, executed by Marco Rizzo and Francesco Zaccato from drawings by Titian. Nothing richer, more elegant, or more beautiful can be imagined.

It would take more space than I have at my disposal to describe in detail the chapels of Saint Clement, of the Madonna dei Mascoli, in which there is a magnificent retable by Nicolo Pisano, and the treasures of art met with at every step: now an alabaster Madonna with her bambino, exquisitely suave, now a bas-relief charmingly wrought, in which the peacocks' tails form a halo, or a Turkish arch embroidered with Arab lace-work and checker-work of enamelled arabesques; then a pair of bronze candelabra, chased in a way to discourage Benvenuto Cellini, — some object of art either curious or venerable.

The mosaic pavement, which waves like the sea in consequence of the age and the settling of the piles, presents the most astounding medley of arabesques, scrolls, fleurons, lozenges, and interlacing checker-work, storks, griffins, open-mouthed, winged, and taloned chimeras, ramping and climbing like the monsters of heraldry. One is fairly terrified and confounded by the creative power displayed by men in this ornamental fancifulness; it is a world as varied, as numerous, as swarming as the other, but which draws its forms from itself alone.

SAN MARCO

How much time, care, patience, and genius, how much cost must have been involved for eight centuries in consummating this immense mass of riches and masterpieces! How many golden sequins have been melted into the glass of the mosaics! How many antique temples and mosques have yielded up their pillars to support these capitals! How many quarries have been exhausted to provide the slabs for the pillars and the overlayings of Verona brocatelle, of portor, of lumachella, of red alabaster, of cyphissus, of veined granite, of mosaic granite, of verd antique, of red porphyry, of black and white porphyry, of serpentine of jasper! What armies of artists, following each other from generation to generation, have drawn, chased, and carved in this cathedral! Even leaving out the unknown, the humble workmen of the Middle Ages, lost in the night of time, who buried themselves in their work, what a long line of names might be drawn up worthy of being inscribed on the golden book of art! Among the painters who furnished cartoons for the mosaics, — for there is not a single painting in the sanctuary, — are numbered Titian, Tintoretto, Palma, Padovanino, Salviatino, Aliense, Pilotti, Sebastian Rizzi, Tizianello; among the master mosaic-workers, at the head of whom must be placed old Petrus (author of the colossal Christ at the back of the church), are the brothers Zuccati, Bozza, Vincenzo Bianchini, Luigi Gaetano, Michele Zambono, Giacomo Passerini; among the sculptors, all men of prodigious talent, whom one is surprised to find are not better known, Pietro Lombardi, Campanetti, Zuanne Alberghetti, Paolo Savi, the brothers della Massegne, Jacopo Benato, Sansovino, Pietro Zuana, delle Campania, Lorenzo Bregno, and many others, any one of whom would suffice to make an epoch illustrious.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

In front of the church rise the three standards, supported by the bronze pedestals of Alessandro Leopardi which represent marine deities, and chimeras exquisite in workmanship and polish. The three standards were formerly those of Cyprus, Candia, and Moro, the three maritime possessions of Venice; now on Sundays the black and yellow banner of Austria alone waves in the breeze which comes from Greece and the Orient.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

THE PALACE OF THE DOGES

THE Palace of the Doges, in its present form, dates from the time of Marino Faliero, and has replaced an older building founded about 814 under Angelo Participazio and continued by different doges. Marino Faliero it was who caused to be built in 1355 the existing façades on the Molo and the Piazzetta. The building proved unlucky to both the Doge and the architect: the former was beheaded, the latter hanged.

The strange edifice, which was at once a palace, a Senate house, a Court house, and a prison under the government of the Republic, is entered by an exquisite door on the San Marco corner between the pillars of Saint Jean d'Acre and the enormous squat column which bears up the whole weight of the mighty white and rose marble wall that imparts such striking originality to the Palace of the Doges. This door, called della Carta, is in a charming architectural style, ornamented with slender pillars, trefoils, and statues, and, of course, the inevitable winged lion and Saint Mark. It leads through a vaulted passage into the great inner court. This peculiar placing of the entrance, outside, as it were, the building to which it leads, has the advantage of not interfering in any way with the unity of the façade, which is broken by no projection save that of the monumental windows.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Above the huge, heavy column of which I have spoken there is a fierce looking bas-relief representing the Judgment of Solomon. The mediæval costumes and a certain savageness in the execution make it difficult to recognise the subject. On the other side, towards the sea, are the figures of Adam and Eve, and on the angle cut by the Ponte della Paglia, the Sin of Noah. The old man's arm, carved with fine Gothic dryness, shows every muscle and every vein.

On the Piazzetta, on the second story, two columns of red marble mark the place where were proclaimed sentences of death, a custom which still persists. The thirteenth capital of the lower gallery, counting from Saint Mark, is also highly praised. It contains in eight compartments as many ages of human life very cleverly rendered. For the matter of that, all the capitals are in exquisite taste and wonderfully varied; there are no two alike. They contain monsters, angels, children, fantastic animals, biblical or historical subjects, mingled with scrolls, acanthus leaves, fruits, and flowers. Several bear half-effaced inscriptions in Gothic characters. There are seventeen arches on the Molo and eighteen on the Piazzetta.

THE PALACE OF THE DOGES

The Porta della Carta leads to the Giants' Staircase, which is in no wise gigantic in itself its name being due to two colossi some twelve feet in height, by Sansovino, representing Neptune and Mars, placed on pedestals at the top of the stairs. It leads from the court to the second gallery, which runs within as well as without the palace, and it was built under the rule of Doge Agostino Barberigo by Antonio Rizzi. It is in white marble, and decorated by Domenico and Bernardino of Mantua with arabesques and trophies in very low relief, but so perfect as to drive to despair all decorators, jewellers, and niello workers in the world. It ceases to be architecture; it is goldsmith's work such as Benvenuto Cellini and Vechte alone could produce. Every bit of the open-worked balustrade is a marvel of invention; the arms and the helmets of each bas-relief, all dissimilar, exhibit the rarest fancifulness and are in the purest style; the very steps themselves are inlaid with exquisite ornaments. And yet who knows about Domenico and Bernardino of Mantua? Human memory, already overlaid with hundreds of illustrious names, refuses to remember more, and consigns to oblivion some which deserve to be glorious.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

At the foot of the stairs are placed, where is usually found the railhead, two baskets of fruit worn by the hands of people who ascend. The statues of Neptune and Mars, in spite of their great size and the exaggerated prominence of the muscles, are somewhat weak, considered æsthetically, but set off by the architecture, they have a proud and majestic look. On the plinth is the artist's name, who, I consider, did far better work in his statuettes of the Apostles and in the door of the sacristy of San Marco.

On turning around at the top of the stairs, one sees the inner side of Bartolommeo's façade covered with volutes, slender columns, and statues, with vestiges of blue colouring starred with gold in the pediments of the arches. Among these statues, one especially is exceedingly remarkable. It represents Eve, and is the work of Antonio Rizzi of Verona in 1471. Its charming form exhibits a certain Gothic timidity of style, and its ingenuous pose recalls with adorable awkwardness the attitude of the Venus of Medici, the pagan Eve. The other façade, which looks upon the Cisterns, was built in 1607 in the Renaissance style, with pillars and niches holding antique statues brought from Greece, representing warriors, orators, gods, and goddesses. A clock and a statue of Doge Urbino, the work of Gio Bandini of Florence, complete the severe and classical façade.

THE PALACE OF THE DOGES

On looking at the centre of the court are seen what appear to be magnificent bronze altars. They are the openings of the cisterns, by Nicolo de Conti and Francesco Alberghetti. The one is of 1556, the other of 1559, and both are masterpieces. They represent, besides the usual griffins, sirens, and chimeras, various aquatic subjects drawn from Scripture. It is impossible to imagine the richness, the invention, the exquisite taste, the perfection of carving, the finish of the work of these well margins, which are improved by the polish and the patina of time. Even the interior of the cistern mouth, overlaid by bronze plates, is enriched by a damasked design in arabesques. The two cisterns are said to hold the best water in Venice, therefore they are greatly frequented, and the ropes by which the pails are pulled up have worn in the bronze edges grooves two or three inches deep.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Nowhere else in Venice is there a better place to study the interesting class of women water-carriers, whose beauty is somewhat gratuitously famous, in my opinion, for if I did see a few pretty ones, I saw very many more ugly and old. Their costume is rather striking. They wear tall men's-hats of black felt and a long black skirt which comes up under their arms like an Empire gown; their feet are bare, as well as their legs, although they sometimes wear on the latter a sort of knemis or footless stocking, like the peasants of the Valencian Huerta. Their chemise, of coarse linen, plaited on the bosom and with short sleeves, completes their dress. They carry the water on their shoulders in two pails of red copper which balance. Most of these women are Tyrolese.

At the very moment when I stopped at the head of the staircase, there was bending over the brazen margin of Nicolo de Conti's cistern one of these young Tyrolese, who was pulling up with difficulty, — for she was short and delicate, — a full pail of water. Her neck showed, under the masculine headdress, her pretty, fair hair and the upper part of her white shoulders, on which the hot sun had not yet tanned the snows of the mountain. A painter would have found in this a subject for a pretty picture. Personally I greatly prefer to the habit of walking between two pails the Spanish and African manner of carrying the water on the head in an amphora held in equilibrium. Women thus gain an astonishing nobility of port. By the way they stand and walk, one would think they were antique statues. But I have talked enough about water-carriers.

THE PALACE OF THE DOGES

Near the Giants' Staircase is seen an inscription framed in with ornaments and figures by Alessandro Vittoria, recalling the passage of Henry III through Venice, and farther along, in the gallery at the entrance to the Golden Staircase, two statues by Antonio Aspetti, — Hercules, and Atlas bending under the starry firmament, the weight of which the robust hero is about to take on his bull neck. This exceedingly magnificent staircase, ornamented with stucco work by Vittoria and paintings by Gianbattista was built by Sansovino, and leads to the Library which now occupies several rooms in the Palace of the Doges.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The former assembly hall of the Great Council (Sala del Maggior Consiglio) is one of the largest in existence. The Court of the Lions at the Alhambra could easily be put within it. One is struck with astonishment on entering, for, thanks to an effect frequent in architecture, the hall appears to be very much larger than the building which contains it. Sombre and severe wainscoting, in which bookcases have taken the place of the stalls of the former senators, serves as a plinth to immense paintings which run around the wall, broken only by the windows, under a line of portraits of the doges, and a colossal ceiling gilded all over, incredibly rich and exuberant in ornamentation, with vast compartments, square, octagonal, oval, with branches, volutes and rocaille, in a style not very appropriate to the style of the palace, but so grandiose and magnificent that it fairly dazzles one. One of the sides of the hall — that in which is the entrance door — is filled completely by a gigantic “Paradise” by Tintoretto, which contains a whole world of figures. The sketch of a similar subject in the Louvre may give an idea of this composition, of a kind which suited the fiery and disorderly genius of that virile artist who so thoroughly bore out the meaning of his name, Jacopo Robusto; for it is a robust painting, and it is a pity that time has darkened it so much. The murkiness which covers it would suit a picture of Hell equally as well as a picture of Paradise. Behind this canvas there exists, it is said, an old painting of Paradise done on the wall in green camaieu by Guariento of Padua in the year 1365. It would be interesting to compare the green paradise with the black. It takes Venice to have one painting upon another.

THE PALACE OF THE DOGES

The hall is a sort of Versailles Museum of Venetian history, with the difference that although the exploits represented are less, the painting is far superior. No more marvellous prospect can be imagined than this vast hall covered all over with these pompous paintings in which the Venetian genius excelled, most skilful as it was in the arrangement of great works. On all sides there is the shimmer of velvet, the sheen of silk, the sparkle of taffeta, the brilliancy of gold brocade, the bossing of gems, the heavy folds of stiff dalmatics, the fantastic chasing of cuirasses and morions, damascened with light and shade and reflecting gleams like mirrors. The sky fills in with the blue peculiar to Venice the interstices of the white pillars, and on the steps of the marble staircases stand splendid groups of senators, of warriors, of patricians and pages, which form the usual population of a Venetian painting. The battles exhibit an indescribable chaos of galleys with three-storied castles, tops, look-outs, triple banks of oars, towers, war machines, overthrown ladders bringing down clusters of men; an amazing mingling of galley drivers, of galley slaves, of sailors, of men-at-arms, killing each other with maces, cutlasses, and barbarous engines; some bare to the belt, others dressed in singular harness or in Oriental costumes in capricious and eccentric taste, like those of Rembrandt's Turks; all swarming and fighting, against a background of smoke and fire, or on waves which throw up between the galleys their long, green crests ending in flakes of foam. It is regrettable that in many of these paintings time has added its smoke to that of battle, but imagination profits by the loss to the eye. Time gives more than it takes from the pictures it works over. Many masterpieces owe a portion of their merit to the patina with which the ages have gilded them.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Above these great historical paintings runs a series of portraits of Doges by Tintoretto, Bassano, and other painters. Generally they have dark and repellent faces, although they are beardless, contrary to the generally accepted opinion. In one corner the eye stops at an empty black frame which marks a break as sombre as a tomb in the chronological gallery. It is the place which should have been filled by the portrait of Marino Faliero, as is told in the inscription : Locus Marini Phaletri, decapitati pro criminibus. Every effigy of Marino Faliero was also destroyed, so that his portrait is not to be found. It is said, however, that there is one in the possession of a Verona amateur.

THE PALACE OF THE DOGES

Let me add concerning Marino Faliero that he was not beheaded at the top of the Giants' Staircase, because that staircase was not built until one hundred and fifty years later, but at the opposite angle at the other end of the gallery on the landing of a stair since destroyed.

I shall name, without pretending to describe them in detail, the most celebrated halls in the palace: the Sala dei Scarlatti, the mantelpiece of which is covered with marble reliefs of the most delicate workmanship. There is also placed over it a very curious marble bas-relief representing Doge Loredano kneeling before the Virgin and Child accompanied by several saints. It is a capital work by an unknown artist. The Sala dello Scudo, where were placed the arms of the living Doge; the Sala dei Filosofi, in which there is a very beautiful chimney-piece by Pietro Lombardi; the Stanze dei Stucchi, thus named on account of its ornamentation. It contains paintings by Salviati, Pordenone, and Bassano, — a Madonna, a “Descent from the Cross,” and a “Nativity.” The Banquet hall, where the Doge gave state dinners, — diplomatic dinners, as one would say to-day. It has a portrait of Henry III by Tintoretto, strongly painted and very handsome, and opposite the door a warmly painted “Adoration of the Magi,” by Bonifazio. The Sala delle Quattro Porte, preceded by a square hall the ceiling of which, painted by Tintoretto, represents “Justice handing the sword and the scales to the Doge Priuli.” The four doors are decorated by statues of fine port by Giulio del Moro, Francesco Caselli, Girolamo Campagna, Alessandro Vittoria; and masterpieces of painting, among others one representing the “Doge Marino Grimani kneeling before the Virgin, with Saint Mark and other saints,” by Contarini; and another of Doge Antonio, also kneeling before Faith, by Titian, a splendid, golden painting in which simplicity is in no wise diminished by the ceremonious style. The compartments of the ceiling were designed by Palladio, the stucco work is by Vittoria and Bombarda, from the designs of Sansovino. A "Venice" by Tintoretto, led by Jupiter over the Adriatic in the centre of a court of deities, fills the central compartment.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

THE PALACE OF THE DOGES

Let us pass next from this hall into the Ante Collegio, the waiting-room of the ambassadors, designed by Scamozzi. The envoys of the various powers who came to present their letters of credit to the Most Serene Republic, cannot have felt in a hurry to be introduced; the masterpieces accumulated in this splendid antechamber would enable one to wait patiently. The four paintings placed near the door are by Tintoretto, and are among his best. I know of none to equal them save the "Adam and Eve," and the "Abel and Cain" in the Academy of Fine Arts. The subjects are: "Mercury and the Graces," "The Forge of Vulcan," "Pallas, accompanied by Joy and Abundance, driving away Mars," "Ariadne consoled by Bacchus."

The marvel of this sanctuary of art is the "Rape of Europa" by Paolo Veronese. The lovely maid is seated as upon a silver throne upon the back of the divine bull, whose snow-white chest breaks into the blue sea, which seeks to reach with its amorous ripples the feet of Europa, which she draws up with a childish dread of wetting them,—an ingenious detail in the “Metamorphoses” which the painter was careful not to forget. Europa’s companions, not knowing that the god has taken the noble form of that handsome animal so gentle and so familiar, crowd upon the bank and cast garlands of flowers at it, unaware that Europa, thus carried away, is going to give her name to a continent and to become the mistress of Zeus with the black eyebrows and the ambrosial hair. How beautiful show the white shoulders, the fair neck with the tressed hair, and the lovely, round arms! Over the whole of that marvellous painting, in which Paolo Veronese seems to have reached the highest point of perfection, there is a glow of eternal youth. The sky, the clouds, the trees, the flowers, the ground, the sea, the carnation, the draperies, all seem flushed with the light of an unknown Elysium. All is warm and fresh like youth, seductive like voluptuousness, calm and pure like strength. There is no mannerism in the carefulness, no unhealthiness in the radiant joy. In the presence of that canvas,—this is high praise for Watteau,—I thought of the “Departure for Cythera;” only, you must substitute for the lamps of the Opera the splendid daylight of the East, for the dainty dolls of the Regency in their dresses of ruffled taffeta, superb bodies in which Greek beauty assumes a softer grace under the touch of Venetian voluptuousness, and which yielding and living draperies caress. If I had to choose a unique work in all Veronese’s, this is the painting I should prefer. It is the finest gem in his rich casket of jewels.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

THE PALACE OF THE DOGES

On the ceiling the great artist has placed his dear Venice upon a golden throne with the rich breadth and the abundant grace of which he knows the secret. When he paints his Assumption, in which Venice takes the place of the Virgin, he always manages to find new azure and new beams.

The magnificent mantelpiece by Aspetti, the stucco cornice by Vittoria and Bombarda, the blue camaieus by Sebastian Rizzi, the pillars of verd antique and cipolin framing in the door complete this wondrous decoration, which is marked by the most beautiful of all luxury, the luxury of genius.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The reception-room or Collegio comes next. Here we find again Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese, the one tawny and violent, the other azure and calm, the former best on great walls, the second on vast ceilings. Tintoretto has painted in this hall "Doge Andrea praying to the Virgin and Child," the "Marriage of Saint Catherine," the "Doge Dona," the "Virgin under a baldacchino," and the "Christ adored by the Doge Luigi Mocenigo." On the other wall Paolo Veronese has represented Christ enthroned, with the personification of Venice by his side; Faith and Angels who hold out palms to Sebastian Venier, who became Doge afterward and won the famous victory over the Turks at Cursolari on Saint Justina's day,—the latter saint figures in the painting,—the famous proveditore Agostino Barberigo, who was slain in that battle, and the two figures, on either side, of Saint Sebastian and Saint Justina in grisaille, the one in allusion to the victor's name, the other to the date of the victory.

A magnificent ceiling contains in its compartments the complete deification of Venice by Paolo Veronese, who was particularly fond of this subject. As if this apotheosis did not suffice, Venice again figures above the window with crown and sceptre in a painting by Carletto Cagliari.

THE PALACE OF THE DOGES

I feel that in spite of myself, the nomenclature grows apace, but at every step I am stayed by a masterpiece. How can I help it? I shall be unable to tell you everything,—let your own imagination work. There are also in the Palace of the Doges three wondrous rooms which I have not even named: The Hall of the Council of Ten, of the Senate, of the Inquisitors of State, and many more. Place the “Apotheosis of Venice” cheek by jowl with the “Assumption of the Virgin” on the ceilings and the walls; make the Doges kneel before the one or the other of these Madonnas, with mythological heroes and gods of fable; place the lion of Saint Mark near the eagle of Jupiter, the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa near Neptune, Pope Alexander III near a short-skirted Allegory; mingle with stories drawn from the Bible and Virgins under baldacchinos, captures of Zara full of remarkable episodes out of a canto in Ariosto, the surprise of Candia, and massacres of Turks; carve the jambs and the lintels of the doors, load the cornices with stucco-work and mouldings, set up statues in every corner, gild everything which has not been painted by the brush of a great artist ; say to yourself : “ All those who worked here, even the unknown, had twenty times the talent of the celebrities of our day, and the greatest masters wore their lives out in this place ” ; — and then you may have a faint idea of splendours which beggar description.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Near the door of one of these halls is still to be seen, though its prestige of terror is lost now that it is reduced to the condition of an unused letter-box, the old Lion’s Mouth into which informers cast their denunciations. All that is left is the hole in the wall ; the mouth itself has been pulled away. A sombre corridor leads from the Hall of the Inquisitors of State to the Leads and the Wells, which have given rise to so many sentimental declamations. Undoubtedly there can be no fine prisons, but the truth is that the Leads were large rooms covered over with lead, the material generally used in Venice for roofing, and which does not involve any particular cruelty ; also, the Wells were in no wise below the level of the Lagoon. I visited two or three of these dungeons. I expected architectural phantasmagoria in the taste of Piranesi, — arches and squat pillars, winding stairs, complex gratings, enormous rings made fast in monstrous blocks, narrow slits letting fall a greenish light upon the damp pavement, — and to be admitted by a jailer wearing a foxskin cap with the tail hanging down, and bunches of keys clanking at his girdle. As a matter of fact it was a venerable guide, looking like a Paris janitor, who preceded me, candle in hand, through narrow, dark passageways. The wainscoted cells had a low door and a small opening opposite the lamp hanging from the ceiling of the passageway. A wooden camp bed was in one corner. It was close and dark, but in no wise melodramatic; a philanthropist designing a cell could not have done worse.

THE PALACE OF THE DOGES

On the walls are to be read some of the inscriptions which weary prisoners engrave with a nail on the walls of their tomb: signatures, dates, short sentences drawn from the Bible, philosophical thoughts suitable to the place, a timid aspiration for liberty; sometimes the cause of the imprisonment, as in the inscription which relates that a captive was imprisoned for sacrilege, having given food to a dead man. At the entrance to the corridor I was shown a stone bench on which were seated those who were secretly put to death in the prison. A fine cord passed around the neck and twisted garote fashion strangled them after the Turkish mode. These clandestine executions occurred only in the case of prisoners of state convicted of political crimes. The deed done, the body was put into a gondola through a door which opens on the Canal della Paglia, and it was thrown overboard with a cannon-ball or a stone tied to the feet in the Orfanello Canal, which was very deep and where fishermen were forbidden to cast their nets. Ordinary assassins were executed between the two pillars at the entrance to the Piazzetta.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The Bridge of Sighs, which as seen from the Ponte della Paglia looks like a cenotaph suspended over the water, is nowise remarkable internally. It is a covered double corridor, separated by a wall, which leads from the Ducal Palace to the prison, a severe, solid piece of work by Antonio da Ponte situated on the other side of the Canal and which looks upon the side façade of the palace supposed to have been built from the designs of Antonio Ricci. The name of Bridge of Sighs given to this tomb which connects two prisons probably arose from the complaints of the unfortunates as they proceeded from their cells to the tribunal or from the tribunal to their cells, broken by torture or driven desperate by condemnation. At night the canal, closed in by the high walls of the two sombre edifices lighted only by occasional lights, looks most sombre and mysterious, and the gondolas which glide along bearing a couple of lovers, seem to be bound, with a burden, for the Orfanello Canal.

THE PALACE OF THE DOGES

I also visited the former apartments of the Doge, which have lost all their primitive magnificence save an exceedingly ornamental ceiling divided into hexagonal compartments gilded and painted. Within these compartments, concealed by the foliage and the roses, was cut an invisible hole, through which the Inquisitors of State and the members of the Council of Ten could spy at any hour of the day and night what the Doge was doing. The walls, not satisfied with listening through an ear, as in the prison of Dionysius, looked through an open eye, and the Doge, victorious at Zara and Candia, heard, like Angelo, steps in the wall and felt himself mysteriously and jealously watched.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

THE GRAND CANAL

THE Grand Canal is to Venice what the Strand is to London, the Rue Saint-Honoré to Paris, the Calle d'Alcala to Madrid,—the chief artery of the city. It is in the shape of a reversed S, the centre of which cuts into the city in the direction of San Marco, while the upper point ends by the island of Santa Chiara and the lower by the Dogana near the Giudecca Canal. It is cut about the centre by the Rialto.

The Grand Canal at Venice is the most wonderful thing in the world; no other city affords so fair, so strange, so fairylike a prospect. Equally remarkable specimens of architecture may be met with elsewhere, but none under such picturesque conditions. Every palace has a mirror in which it can gaze upon its own beauty; the splendid reality is duplicated by a lovely reflection; the water lovingly laves the feet of these beautiful façades bathed in a golden light and cradles them in a double heaven. The smaller vessels and the larger boats which can ascend the canal seem moored on purpose to fill up the foreground for the greater advantage of scene painters and water-colour painters.

THE GRAND CANAL

Every wall tells a story, every house is a palace, every palace a masterpiece and a legend. With every stroke of the oar, the gondolier calls out a name which was as well known in crusading days as to-day, and this goes on for more than half a league. The list of palaces would fill up five or six pages. Pietro Lombardi, Vittoria, Sansovino, Sammichelli, the great Veronese architect, Domenico Rossi, Visentini designed and superintended the building of these princely dwellings; to say nothing of the marvellous anonymous artists of the Middle Ages who erected the most picturesque and the most romantic, those which give to Venice its peculiar stamp and individuality.

On both banks follow uninterruptedly façades equally charming and diversely beautiful. Next to a Renaissance building with its superimposed pillars and orders, stands a mediæval palace in the Gothic and Arab style of which the Palace of the Doges is the prototype, with traceried balconies, arches, trefoils, and dentellated acroter; then a façade overlaid with coloured marbles and adorned with medallions and brackets; then a great rose-coloured wall with a vast pillared window. You meet with every possible variety, — Byzantine, Saracen, Lombard, Gothic, Romanesque, Greek, and even rococo architecture; pillars and columns, Gothic and Roman arches, fantastic capitals full of birds and flowers brought from Acre or Jaffa, or Greek capitals found among Athenian ruins, mosaics and bassi-relievi, classic severity and the elegant fancifulness of the Renaissance. It is an immense open-air gallery, in which one can study from a gondola the progress of art during seven or eight centuries. How much genius, talent, and money have been expended in a space traversed in less than an hour! What prodigious artists, and what intelligent and splendid lords! What a pity that the patricians who caused such beautiful palaces to be built should now exist only in the paintings of Titian, Tintoretto, and Moro!

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Even before reaching the Rialto there rises on the left as you ascend the canal, the Palazzo Dario in the Lombard-Gothic style of the fifteenth century; the Palazzo Venier, the corner of which shows, with its ornaments, its precious marbles, and its medallions, also in the Lombard style; the Academy of the Fine

THE GRAND CANAL

Arts, the old Scuola di Santa Maria della Carità, with its classical façade surmounted by a Minerva with a lion; the Palazzo Contarini degli Scrigni, the work of Scamozzi; the Palazzo Rezzonico with its three superimposed orders; the two Palazzi Schiavoni, where lives Natale Schiavoni, a descendant of the famous painter of that name, who has a gallery of paintings and a beautiful daughter, the living reproduction of a canvas painted by her ancestor; the Palazzo Foscari, easily known by its low door with its two stories of slender pillars supporting Gothic arches and trefoils, where formerly lodged the sovereigns who visited Venice, and now deserted; the Palazzo Balbi, on the balcony of which princes leaned to watch the regattas which took place on the Grand Canal with so much brilliancy and magnificence in the heyday of the Republic; the Palazzo Pisani, in the German pointed style of the fourteenth century; and the Palazzo Tiepolo, very stylish and comparatively modern, with its two elegant pyramidions. On the right, close to the Hôtel de l'Europe rises between two tall buildings a lovely palazzino which consists of a window and a balcony,—but what a window, and what a balcony! A lace-work of stone scrolls and tracery ! Farther on, the Palazzo Corner della Cà Grande, built in 1532, one of the best works of Sansovino; the Palazzo Grazzi, now the Hôtel de l'Empereur, the marble staircase of which is adorned with beautiful orange trees in pots; the Palazzo Corner Spinelli; the Palazzo Grimani, a powerful piece of work by Sammichelli, the lower marble course of which is adorned by a double fret of striking effect, — it is now the postoffice; the Palazzo Farsetti, with a pillared peristyle and a long gallery of slender columns running along the whole façade, now occupied by the municipal offices. I might say, as does Don Ruy Gomez de Silva to Charles V in “Hernani,” when showing his ancestors’ portraits, “I pass many, and of the best.” I shall, nevertheless, mention the Palazzo Loredan and the ancient dwelling of Enrico Dandolo, the victor of Constantinople. Between the palaces there are houses equally good, whose chimneys, ending in turrets, turbans, and flower vases, diversify very agreeably the great architectural lines.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Sometimes a traghetto (landing) or a piazzetta like the Campo San Vitale, for instance, which lies opposite the Academy, makes a pleasant break in this long line of monuments. The Campo, bordered by houses coloured with a bright, cheerful red, contrasts most happily with the vine leaves of a tavern arbour; that red dash in that line of façades, more or less darkened by time, pleases and rests the eye. You can always find a painter there, palette in hand and paint-box on his knees; and the gondoliers and the handsome girls, whom these rascals always attract, pose naturally, and from being admirers are turned into models.

THE GRAND CANAL

The Rialto, which is the handsomest bridge in Venice, has a very grand, monumental look. It spans the canal with a single bold, elegant arch. It was built in 1588-1592, when Pasquale Cicogna was Doge, by Antonio da Ponte. It replaced the old wooden drawbridge.

Two rows of shops separated in the centre by an arcaded portico and giving a glimpse of the sky, line the sides of the bridge, which may be crossed by any one of three ways, — the roadway in the centre, and the two outer pavements with their marble balustrades. In the immediate neighbourhood of the Rialto, which is one of the most picturesque points on the Grand Canal, are crowded together the oldest houses in Venice with their flat roofs, on which are planted posts for awnings, with tall chimneys, portly balconies, stairs with disjointed steps, and great patches of red wash, the broken plaster in which shows the dark walls and the foundations turned green by contact with the water. There is always near the Rialto a mob of boats and gondolas, and stagnant islets of crafts moored and drying their brown sails which are sometimes adorned with a great cross. Shylock, the Jew who hungered for Christian flesh, had his shop on the Rialto, which is honoured by having furnished the setting of a scene to Shakespeare.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

On either side of the Rialto are grouped on both banks the Fondaco dei Tedeschi, whose walls, coloured with doubtful tints, suggest frescoes by Titian and Tintoretto like vanishing dreams; the Fish Market, the Grass Market; the Fabbriche Vecchie, erected by Scarpagnino, in 1520, and the Fabbriche Nuove erected by Sansovino in 1535, in a ruinous condition, and in which are installed different government offices. These ruinous Fabbriche, with their red tones and their wondrous shades due to age and neglect, must drive the municipality to despair and cause the deepest joy to painters. Under the arcades swarms a busy, noisy population which ascends and descends, goes and comes, buys and sells, laughs and shouts. There fresh-caught tunny is sold in red slices, and mussels, oysters, crabs, and prawns are carried away in basketfuls; while under the arch of the bridge, where is constantly heard a sonorous echo, sleep the gondoliers in the shade, awaiting customers.

THE GRAND CANAL

Still proceeding up the canal, there is seen on the left the Palazzo Corner della Regina, so named from Queen Cornaro. The building, which is by Domenico Rossi, is exceedingly elegant. The sumptuous palace is now the Monte di Pietà, or pawn office.

The Armenian College, which is not far off, is an admirable building by Baldassare de Longhena, of a rich, solid, and imposing architecture. It was formerly the Palazzo Pesaro. On the right rises the Palazzo della Cà d'Oro, one of the loveliest on the Grand Canal. It belongs to Mlle. Taglioni, who has had it restored most intelligently. It is embroidered, dentelated, traceried all over in a Greek, Gothic, barbaric taste, so contrasting, so light, so aerial that it seems to have been made on purpose for the home of a sylph. Mlle. Taglioni has taken pity on these poor, abandoned palaces. She pensions a number of them, which she keeps up out of sheer pity for their beauty. Three or four were pointed out to me which she has charitably restored.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Now look at these mooring posts painted blue and white with golden fleurs de lys. They mean that the former Palazzo Vendramin Calergi has become a semi-royal dwelling. It is the home of Her Highness the Duchess of Berry, and she is certainly better lodged there than in the Marsan Pavilion; for this palace, one of the finest in Venice, is a masterpiece of architecture, and the sculpture is wonderfully fine. There is nothing prettier than the groups of children holding the shields on the arches of the windows. The interior is full of precious marbles. Two porphyry columns, of such wondrous beauty that they alone are worth the cost of the palace, are much admired.

I have not yet spoken of the Palazzo Moncenigo, where dwelt Byron, yet my gondola skirted the marble steps where, her hair blowing wild, her feet in the water, in rain and in storm, the girl of the people, the nobleman's mistress, welcomed him on his return with these tender words: "You great dog of the Madonna! Is this the kind of weather to go to the Lido in?" The Palazzo Barberigo also deserves mention. I did not see its twenty-two Titians which the Russian consul has under seal, having purchased them for his master, but it still contains some very fine paintings, and the carved and gilded cradle intended for the heir of the noble family,— a cradle which might be turned into a tomb, for the Barberigos, like most of the old Venetian families, are extinct. Of nine hundred patrician families inscribed on the Golden Book, there are scarcely fifty left to-day.

THE GRAND CANAL

The old Fondaco de' Turchi, so much frequented in the days when Venice held the trade of the East and of India, has two stories of Moorish arches which have fallen in or which are filled up by hovels that have grown there like poisonous mushrooms.

At about the point where opens the Cannaregio are seen traces of the siege and of the Austrian bombardment. Some of the shells fell on the Palazzo Labbia, which was burned, and have marked the unfinished façade of San Geremia. As one draws away from the centre of the city, life diminishes, many windows are closed or boarded over, but that very sadness has a beauty of its own. It is more easily felt by the soul than by the eyes, which are treated constantly to the most unexpected effects of light and shade of varied fabbriche, which are the more picturesque for their ruined condition, to the perpetual movement of the waters and the blue and rose tint which forms the atmosphere of Venice.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

TRAVELS IN ITALY

LIFE IN VENICE

AS I intended to make a prolonged stay in Venice, I took up my abode at the corner of the Campo San Moisè, whence I looked out both on the Square and the Canal. At the back of the Square stood the church of San Moisè, with its flashy and eccentric rococo façade, with its violent and almost savage exaggeration; not the tasteless, soft, old-fashioned rococo that we are accustomed to in France, but a robust, strong, exuberant, inventive, capricious bad taste. The volutes twist like stone flourishes, the brackets jut out unexpectedly, the architraves are broken by deep cuts, carved allegories lean on the pediments of the arches in Michael-Angelesque postures; the statues, with their swollen contours and their manifold draperies, pose in their niches like Hectors or dancing masters; the founder's bust on top of its pedestal is so formidable, with its great moustaches, that it seems to be the very likeness of Don Spavento. Nevertheless, the foliage, close set like the leaves of a cabbage, the hollowed rock-work, the napkin-like carouches, the columns with bracelets, the carelessly carved figures, the overlay of extravagant ornamentation, produce a rich and grandiose effect, in spite of good taste offended by every detail, but offended by a vigorous imagination.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

This truculent façade is connected by a flying bridge with its tower, a diminutive of the Campanile on the Piazza San Marco. In Italy architects have always been bothered by the bells; they either do not wish to or do not know how to connect them with the main building. They seem to have been influenced in spite of themselves by the pagan temples, and to have looked upon the Gothic steeple as a deformed superfluity, a barbarous excrescence. They have turned it into an isolated tower, a sort of belfry, and apparently ignore the splendid effects of ecclesiastical architecture in the North. This by the way. I shall have more than once to repeat this remark.

The entrance to San Moisè is covered by a heavy portière of piqué leather, which, when it is raised, allows a glimpse from the Square of gleams of gilding, of starry tapers in a transparent shadow, and gives passage to warm puffs of incense which mingle with the sounds of the organ and of the prayers. The campanile has no sinecure. It clangs and chimes the livelong day; in the morning it is the Angelus, then Mass, then vespers, then the evening prayer. Its iron tongue is scarcely ever silent; nothing tires out its bronze lungs.

LIFE IN VENICE

Close by, separated by a lane as narrow as the narrowest callejon in Granada or Constantinople, which leads to the traghetto on the Grand Canal, rises in the shadow of the church the presbytery, a sombre façade washed with a faded red tint, pierced with gloomy windows heavily grated, which would strike a dissonant note in this bright Venetian picture did not quantities of wall plants, falling in wild disorder, brighten it up somewhat with their tender green, and a charming Madonna, above a poor-box, smile between two lamps.

The three or four houses opposite contain a baker's shop, a flower shop — the window of which, filled with small pots, shows tulips in bloom and rare plants supported by sticks and provided with scientific labels, — and a general dealer's shop on the corner on the canal side, — all of them whitewashed, diapered with green shutters, rayed with balconies, and surmounted by those turban-topped chimneys which give to Venetian roofs the aspect of a Turkish cemetery.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

On one of these balconies appeared very often a signora who, so far as the distance allowed me to judge, was pretty. She was almost always dressed in black and handled her fan with Spanish dexterity. It struck me I had already seen her somewhere. On thinking the matter over, I recollected that it was in Charles Gozzi's "Memoirs."

On the open face of the Square towards the landing-place there is a single-arched marble bridge which spans the canal and connects the Campo with the lane on the opposite bank leading to the Campo San Maurizio. The canal finishes at one end with one of those perspectives with which the views of Venice have made every one familiar: tall houses, rosy above, green below, their tops in the sunshine and their bases in the water, arched windows by the side of modern square windows, chimneys swelling out into the shape of flower pots, long, striped awnings hanging over the balconies, golden or brown tiles, house tops crowned with statues standing white against the sky, landing-posts painted in bright colours, water gleaming in the shade, boats moored, or skimming with their black sides past the marble staircases, producing unexpected effects of light and shadow. This water-colour, life size, was hung up outside my window on the other side of the canal. At the other end, the canal, again spanned by a bridge, opened out into the Canalezzo and showed a glimpse of the entrance wall of the Dogana di Mare and the bronze Fortune turning in the wind on its golden ball, as well as the rigging of vessels too large to enter the narrow waterways.

LIFE IN VENICE

Seated under my balcony and puffing Levantine tobacco, I shall now make a sketch of Venetian life. It is morning. The white smoke of the cannon-shot from the frigate which denotes the opening of the port, rises from the lagoon, the angelic salutation clangs from the numerous campaniles in the city. Patrician and middle-class Venice is still sound asleep, but the poor devils who spend the night on staircases, on the steps of palaces, or on the bases of columns, have already left their beds and shaken the night dew from their damp rags. The boatmen at the traghetti are washing their gondolas, brushing the cloth and the felzi, polishing the iron of their prows, shaking the black leather cushions and the Persian carpet which lies on the floor of their craft, and getting their boats in order, ready for customers.

The heavy craft which bring provisions to the town begin to arrive from Mestre, Fusino, Zuecca, — a sort of maritime suburb, bordered with buildings on one side and gardens on the other, — from Chioggia, Torcello, and other points on the mainland or the islands. These boats, heaped up with fresh vegetables, grapes, and peaches, leave behind them a delightful odour of greenness which contrasts with the briny smell of the boats laden with tunny, mullets, poulps, oysters, pidocchi (mussels), crabs, shell-fish, and other fruits of the sea, as the picturesque Venetian expression has it. Others, bringing wood and coal, stop at the water-gates to deliver their goods, and then resume their peaceful course. Wine is brought, not in barrels as with us, nor in goat-skins as in Spain, but in great open tubs which it dyes with its purple darker than blackberry-juice. The epithet “black,” which Homer never fails to add to the word wine, is admirably suited to the wines of Friuli and Istria.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The water which is to fill the cisterns is brought in the same way, for Venice, in spite of its aquatic situation, would die of thirst like Tantalus, for it has not a single spring. Formerly the water was fetched from the Brenta Canal at Fusino; now artesian wells supply most of the cisterns. There is scarcely a campo without one. The mouths of these reservoirs, surrounded by a wall like that of a well, have provided Venetian architects and sculptors with the most delightful motives. Sometimes they turn them into Corinthian capitals open in the centre; sometimes into mouths of monsters, or again, they wind around the tambour of bronze, marble, or stone, bacchanals of children, garlands of flowers and fruit, unfortunately worn away too often by the rubbing of the ropes and the copper pails. These cisterns, filled with sand in which the water remains cool, impart a peculiar appearance to the squares. They are open at certain times, and women come to draw water from them as did the Greek slaves from the fountains of antiquity.

LIFE IN VENICE

There! two gondolas have run foul of each other. As you see their halberd irons striking, they look like two angry swans picking at each other's feathers. One of the gondoliers did not hear, or heard too late the warning cry, a sort of yell in an unknown jargon. The dispute grows warmer, and the two champions blackguard each other like Homeric heroes before a battle. Standing on the poop, they are brandishing their sweeps. You fancy they are going to brain each other. There is no fear of that; it is much ado about nothing. The "corpo di Baccho" and other oaths fly from one boat to the other; but soon mythological oaths are insufficient. Insult and blasphemy are exchanged with increasing intensity. Calling heaven into their quarrel, they blackguard their respective saints, and it is noticeable that the vituperation becomes more outrageous as the craft get further apart. Soon nothing is heard but hoarse croaks which are lost in the distance.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Now passes an official gondola with the Austrian ensign in the stern, bearing a stiff, cold functionary, his breast covered with decorations, on his way to some inspection; another is carrying around phlegmatic English tourists; a third, slender as a skate, flies mysteriously and discreetly towards the open sea. The hangings of the felze pulled down and the blinds drawn up shelter two lovers who are going to lunch together at the Punta di Quintavalle. Another, heavier and broader, bears under its white and blue awning a worthy family going to bathe at the Lido, on the shore whose fine sand still preserves the hoof-prints of Byron's horses.

Now the church opens, and there emerges a red procession bearing a red bier, which is placed in a red gondola, for the mourning colour here is red. The dead is being shipped off to the cemetery situated on an island on the way to Murano. The priests, the bearers, the candlesticks, and the church ornaments are placed in another gondola, which goes first. Go and sleep, poor dead man, under the salt sand, under the shadow of an iron cross by which the gulls will sweep For a Venetian's bones the mainland would be too heavy a covering.

LIFE IN VENICE

When any one dies in Venice, there is posted up on his house and upon the neighbouring houses, by way of information, a printed placard giving the name, the age, the birthplace, the cause of death, and a certificate that the dead received the Sacraments, that he died like a good Christian; and asking the faithful to pray for him.

But away with these melancholy thoughts! The wake of the red boat has disappeared. Let us forget it as the wave does, which preserves no marks. It is of life, and not of death that we must think.

On the bridge are coming and going young girls, working girls, shop girls, servants, with a chemise and a skirt under their long shawl. On their necks are rolled up long plaits of the reddish hair so dear to the Venetian painter. I salute from my window these models of Paolo Veronese, who pass by without remembering that they posed three hundred years ago for the "Wedding at Cana." Old women, hooded with the national baùte, hasten on to get to Mass in time, for the last stroke is sounding from San Moisè. Austrian soldiers in blue trousers, black boots, and gray tunics walk across the bridge, which sounds under their heavy, regular steps, as they carry to some barracks the wood for the kitchen or the victuals for breakfast. Illustrissimi, old ruined nobles, who yet have the grand air, with their clean, worn clothes, are going to Florian's, the meeting-place of the aristocracy, to drink the excellent coffee, the recipe for which was transmitted to Venice by Constantinople, and which is not equalled anywhere else. Elsewhere, perhaps, these ghosts of the past would call forth a smile, but the Venetian people love their nobility, which was always kindly and familiar.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Nothing is done in the ordinary way in this quaint city. The street musical instruments, instead of being carted on the backs of the players, are carried along by water; the grinding organs travel in gondolas. There is one passing now under my balcony, one of those big organs made in Cremona, the home of good violins. Nothing could be more unlike those boxes which make dogs howl with anguish at the corners of our squares. Drums, triangles, and tambourines transform these into a complete orchestra, to the strains of which dance a number of marionettes contained within the frame. It is like an opera overture wandering around. More than one gondola turns out of its way to enjoy the music longer, and the harmonious craft proceeds, followed by a little dilettante flotilla which traverses the canal in its wake.

LIFE IN VENICE

Now let us look towards the Square ; the picture is no less animated there. The open-air kitchen is working, the stoves are blazing, sending up a smell of smoke and the somewhat disagreeable perfume of hot oil. Stews have an important place in Italian life. Sobriety is a Southern virtue which is usually backed by idleness, and there is very little cooking done in the houses. People buy from these open-air kitchens pastes, cakes, bits of poulp, or fried fish ; and many, who do not stand on ceremony, eat their purchases on the spot.

The cook himself is a tall, stout, jolly fellow, a sort of obese Hercules or Palforio, with bright red cheeks, hooked nose, rings in his ears, shining black hair curled in small curls like Astrakhan lamb's wool. He turns around like a king on his throne, having about him three or four rows of shining stamped copper dishes like antique bucklers hanging from the rails of triremes.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The dealer in pumpkins, a vegetable which Venetians are very fond of, also exhibits his wares in quantities which look like cakes of yellow wax, and which he sells in slices. A young maiden from her window signs to the dealer and drops at the end of a string a basket, in which she hauls up a piece of pumpkin proportionate to the amount of money she sent down. This convenient fashion of marketing is entirely in accord with Venetian laziness.

A group has collected in the centre of the Campo, to which are speedily added all the passers-by and all the idlers who have come from the bridge, and who are proceeding by the lane at the side of the church to the Frezzaria or to the Piazza San Marco, the two most frequented places in Venice. A space left clear in the centre of the group is occupied by a poor wretched beggar wearing a mournful hat, dressed in a lamentable coat and ragged trousers. By his side is a hideous old woman, a sort of witch, as wretchedly clothed as the man. A covered basket is placed on the ground before them. A rough-haired dog, sordid, thin, but with the intelligent look of an academic animal trained to all sorts of exercises, gazes at the old couple with that human look which a dog has with its master; it seems to be awaiting a sign or an order. The old man gives a command; the dog dashes to the basket and raises one of the sides of the cover with its teeth. It remains in it for a few seconds, then pushing the other side of the cover with its nose, it comes out triumphantly, holding in its mouth a small piece of folded paper which it places at the feet of the woman. It does this several times, and the spectators snatch from each other the papers thus brought from the basket. The dog is drawing numbers for the lottery. Those which it brings out at certain times are bound to win. The gamblers of both sexes, who are very numerous in Venice as in all wretched countries, in which the hope of sudden fortunes won without work acts powerfully upon the imagination, place the greatest trust in the numbers thus fished out by the dog. As I beheld the deep wretchedness and the hungry look of the couple, and the thin flanks of the dog whose numbers were to win so many crowns, I asked myself why these poor devils did not turn to better advantage the means of wealth which they distributed so generously to others for a few sous. That very natural reflection did not occur to any one. Perhaps the guessers of lottery numbers are like witches, who cannot foretell their own future; clairvoyant for others, they are blind where they themselves are concerned. If it were not so, these two poor wretches would have been greatly to blame for not being millionaires at least.

LIFE IN VENICE

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Venice is full of lottery offices. The winning numbers written upon placards framed in flowers and ribbons in fantastic blue, red, and gold figures, excite the cupidity of the passers-by. At night they are brilliantly lighted with lamps and tapers. The favourite numbers, the numbers which must infallibly win in accordance with the calculations dear to lottery players, are also exhibited with much pomp. Certain gamblers who obstinately stick to these imaginary systems buy them at any cost, and stake, in spite of numerous disappointments, their amounts, which they double or treble in accordance with mathematical progression.

I took a turn in the Public Gardens, a great place planted with trees and making a sort of obtuse angle in the scene, the point ending in a hillock on which is a café frequented by travelling musicians. Children and young girls amuse themselves rolling down the gentle slope covered with fine grass.

LIFE IN VENICE

The sight ranges over the lagoon. One sees Murano, the island of glass-makers; San Servolo with its lunatic hospital, and the low line of the Lido with its sand-hills, its taverns, and its polled trees. Rows of posts indicating the depth of the water, form lanes in this shallow sea on which float masses of seaweed. The prospect is enlivened by the continual coming and going of sails and boats.

The Public Gardens on fête days contain the loveliest collection of Venetian beauties. It is there that one can study the Venetian type which Gozzi describes as biondo, bianco e grassoto.

Necessarily the presence of the Austrians must have modified the Venetian type, although marriages are rare on account of national antipathy; but one still meets with the models of Giovanni Bellini, Giorgione, Titian, and Veronese.

The young girls walk about in groups of two or three, almost all bareheaded, wearing with much taste their splendid fair or brown hair. The dark meridional type is rather rare among women in Venice, although frequent among men. I had already noticed that fact in Spain at Valencia, where the men have black hair, olive complexions, with the tanned, wan look of a tribe of African Bedouins, while the women are as fair, fresh, and rosy as Lancashire farmer girls.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

I saw a great many lovely faces, but though I remember them very well, it would be difficult to reproduce them without a pencil. I shall merely try to suggest the general features. The lines of the face, without being as perfect as those of the Greeks, which are of almost architectural regularity and which are the very type of beauty, have nevertheless a rhythm lacking in Northern faces, which are more worn by thought and the numberless troubles of civilisation. The nose is neater and cleaner in form than Northern noses, which are always marked by something unexpected and capricious. The eyes, too, have that shining placidity which is unknown with us and which recalls the clear, quiet glance of an animal. They are very often black in spite of the fair colour of the hair. On the lips is seen that smorfia, a sort of disdainful smile very provoking and charming, which imparts so much character to the heads of the Italian masters.

The Venetians have most lovely necks and shoulders. Nothing can be imagined more beautiful or more finely rounded. The necks partake at once of the swan and the dove as they bend and swell ; and all sorts of wild hair in rebellious curls escaped from the comb, play on them with changes of light, flashes of sunshine, effects of shadow which would delight a painter. After taking a walk in the Public Gardens one is no longer surprised at the golden splendour of the Venetian school. What had been taken for a dream of art is often but the imperfect reproduction of reality.

LIFE IN VENICE

TRAVELS IN ITALY

GONDOLIERS AND SUNSETS

ON my way back to the Piazzetta I saw some young gentlemen as fond of aquatic prowess as our Parisian club men, driving their gondolas at full speed against the quay wall. When they were within a few inches of the stone revetment, they stopped their craft short by a sudden stroke of the oar. This sport is graceful and exciting. When you see the gondola flying so fast, you are sure that it will be smashed to pieces, but that never occurs, and the fun begins all over again. It is in the same way that Turkish and Arab riders send their horses at full gallop against a wall and pull them up on all fours, making the immobility of repose follow upon the rush of speed. The ancient Venetians may have seen these equestrian fantasias in the Atmeidan at Constantinople and adopted them for use in their own country, where the horse is, so to speak, a chimerical creature. More than one young patrician even now puts on the traditional jacket, cap, and sash, and drives his own gondola himself with great skill. Strangers also are fond of doing so, especially the English, who are a nautical people.

GONDOLIERS AND SUNSETS

There are lovely sunsets in Paris. When you leave the Tuileries by the Place de la Concorde, as you turn towards the Champs-Élysées, it is difficult not to be dazzled by the magnificent spectacle: the masses of trees, and the Egyptian obelisk, the wonderful prospect of the great avenue, the magnificent arch which opens on space, form a splendid setting for the orb which expires in splendour more brilliant to our eyes than that of day. But there is something finer still, and that is a sunset at Venice when you are coming from the Lido, Quintavalle, or the Public Gardens.

The lines of houses of the Giudecca, broken by the dome of San Redentore; the point of the Dogana di Mare with its square tower; the two domes of Santa Maria della Salute, form a marvellous sky line which stands out boldly as the background of the picture. The island of San Giorgio Maggiore, nearer us, sets it off with its church, its dome and brick campanile, — a diminutive of the greater Campanile which is seen on the right, above the old Library and the Palace of the Doges. All these buildings bathed in shadow, for the light is behind them, are of azure, lilac, and violet tones, on which stands out black the rigging of the vessels at anchor. Above them is a conflagration of splendour, an outburst of beams. The sun sinks in masses of topaz, rubies, amethysts, which the wind changes incessantly as it alters the forms of the clouds. Brilliant rays spring between the two cupolas of the Salute. Sometimes, according to the point of view, Palladio's belfry cuts in two the orb of the sun.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

This is all very beautiful, but the wondrous spectacle is made finer by being repeated in the water. The sunset has the Lagoon for a mirror. All the light, all the rays, all the fire, all the phosphorescence, ripple over the waves in sparks, spangles, prisms, and trails of flame, shining, scintillating, flaming, swarming luminously. The tower of San Giorgio Maggiore, with its opaque shadow stretching afar, shows black against the conflagration, which increases its height in the strangest fashion and makes it seem as if its base were within an abyss. The outlines of buildings appear to float between two heavens or between two seas. Is it the water which reflects the sky, or the sky which reflects the water? The eye hesitates, and all is confounded in one vast dazzling splendour.

GONDOLIERS AND SUNSETS

I was landed at the traghetto della Piazzetta in the midst of a rout of gondolas, and I went on to the Piazza through the arcades of the Old Library of San-sovino, now the Viceroy's palace.

It is on the Piazza at about eight in the evening that life in Venice reaches its maximum of intensity. It is impossible to see anything more cheerful, lively, and amusing. The setting sun lights up with the most brilliant rosy red the façade of San Marco, which seems to blush with pleasure and to sparkle radiantly under the dying beams. A few late pigeons fly back to the cornices or the gables, where they will sleep until morning, their heads under their wings.

The Piazza is lined with cafés, like the Palais Royal in Paris, which it resembles in more than one respect. These cafés are in no wise remarkable from the point of view of their decoration, especially if they are compared with the splendid establishments of the kind which Paris possesses. They consist simply of very plain rooms, rather low-ceiled, in which no one ever sits except in the worst winter days. Coffee, which is excellent in Venice, is served on copper trays, with a glass of water which the Venetians spend hours in drinking. Ices and iced drinks are noticeable only for their low price, and are far from equalling the exquisite, refined Spanish iced drinks. The only special thing I found was a grape sherbet, very cool and tasty.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The customers sit under the arcades or on the Piazzetta itself, on which are placed before each café wooden benches and tables. Formerly tents and striped awnings were raised in the centre of the Square; that picturesque custom has vanished. Striped blinds are also becoming rare. They are too often replaced by hideous strips of blue cloth very much like cooks' aprons. Civilised people say they are less showy and in better taste.

Very trig and free and easy looking flower-girls swarm on the Square and amuse passers-by and customers with their pretty requests. When you refuse to buy, they laughingly give you a small bunch and run away. It is not customary to pay them at once, it would be rude, but from time to time you give them a small coin by way of a gift. The flower-girls are followed by vendors of iced fruits who shout, "Caramel! caramel!" in deafening fashion. Their stock consists of candied grapes, figs, pears, and prunes, which they carry in baskets.

Venetian women of the upper class are most de-lightly indolent and lazy. They have forgotten how to walk, through using the gondola. Even in this fine climate, it takes an uncommon combination of circumstances to induce them to venture forth. The sirocco, sunshine, a threatening shower, or a too fresh sea-breeze are sufficient to make them stay at home. The greatest exercise they take is going from their sofa to the balcony to breathe the perfume of the great flowers which bloom so splendidly in the moist, warm air of Venice. Their idle and confined life gives them an indescribably delicate, mat, white complexion.

GONDOLIERS AND SUNSETS

If by chance the weather is exceptionally fine, a few of them may walk two or three times around the Piazza San Marco, when the band is playing in the evening, and they rest long in front of the Café Florian in company with their husbands, brothers, or cavaliere servente.

Formerly Levantines were very numerous in Venice. Their pelisses, their dolmans, their full coats of bright colours showed picturesquely among the crowd which they traversed impassible and grave. They are not so frequently met with now that commerce has been largely transferred to Trieste, but Greeks are often met, with their caps the blue silk

Around the cafés wander street musicians, who perform operatic selections, and tenors singing Lucia or some other air of Donizetti with the rich voices and the admirable, instinctive Italian facility which so closely imitates talent that one may be deceived by it. Chinese marionettes, which differ from ours in that the background of the picture is black and the figures are white, show swiftly one after another under the canvas awning. A group forms in the centre of the square. The tenor is but little listened to, the Chinese marionettes are deserted by the spectators, the caramel sellers cease their monotonous cry, chairs are turned half around, everybody is silent. The desks have been arranged, the music distributed, the military band arrives, the prelude is heard, and they begin. It is the overture to "William Tell." The overture over, the crowd withdraws. Soon there are only a few people walking about, and birrichini, a sort of ruffians whose most honest business is selling smuggled cigars. Though you may still read in the accounts of modern travellers that night is turned into day in Venice, it is none the less true that by midnight the Piazza is deserted, but this will not prevent tourists, on the faith of old accounts which refer to customs fallen into desuetude since the fall of the Republic, from repeating for the next fifty years that the Piazza San Marco swarms with people until daylight. That was true enough when the apartments above the arcades of the Procuratie Vecchie and Nuove were occupied by gamblers and casinos, in which crowded all night a company of nobles, adventurers, and courtesans, — a perpetual carnival in which nothing was lacking, not even the mask, and of which Casanova de Seingalt has given such interesting descriptions in his "Memoirs."

GONDOLIERS AND SUNSETS

The offices of the brokers, the shops in which are

It was time to get back to my gondola, which was waiting for me at the Piazzetta landing. The moon had arisen, and nothing is more delightful than an excursion by moonlight along the Grand Canal or the Giudecca. It is a romantic situation which an enthusiastic traveller cannot omit on a beautiful, bright August night. I had another reason for wandering on the lagoon at a time when it would have been wiser to vanish within my mosquito net. Who has not heard of the gondoliers singing the ottavi of Tasso, and barcarolles in the Venetian dialect, so lisping and broken that it resembles a child's first attempts? The gondoliers have long since ceased to sing, and yet the tradition is not quite lost; the older men do preserve within their memories some episodes of "Jerusalem Delivered," which they are willing enough to recollect in return for a heavy tip and a few jars of Cyprus wine. Like the maidens of Ischia who put on their beautiful Greek costumes for Englishmen alone, the gondoliers will sing their melodies only when well paid for doing so.

GONDOLIERS AND SUNSETS

When we had got some distance out in the great Canal of the Giudecca, which is almost an arm of the sea, about opposite the Jesuit church, the white façade of which was silvered by the moon, my gondolier, after having wetted his whistle, sang in a guttural, deep, somewhat hoarse voice, but which was heard a long way over the water, with prolonged cadences, "La Biondina in Gondoletta," "Pronta la Gondoletta," and the episode of "Erminia among the Shepherds."

I had committed the mistake of bringing my singer with me instead of putting him in a boat at a distance and listening to him from the shore, for the music is pleasanter farther away than near, but being more of a poet than a musician, I wanted to hear the lines.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

THE ARSENAL—FUSINE

IT was fine, and the fancy took me, on seeing the beautiful sky, to go to breakfast at Franco Porto on the Island of San Giorgio Maggiore; turning the opportunity to account to visit Palladio's beautiful church, the red belfry of which shows to such advantage against the lagoon. The façade has been somewhat retouched by Scamozzi. The interior contains, besides the inevitable huge paintings by Tintoretto,—the robust artist who painted acres of masterpieces,—columns of Greek marble, gilded altars, stone and bronze statues, an admirable choir in carved woodwork representing different scenes in the life of Saint Benedict, which recalled to me the wonderful wood carvings by Berruguete in the Spanish cathedrals. A pretty bronze statuette, placed on the choir rail on the right as you enter, represents Saint George, and is remarkable as being the most admirable likeness ever made of Lord Byron. This anticipated, and as it were, prophetic portrait struck me greatly. The head of the Greek saint is the most elegant, disdainful, aristocratic, thoroughly English that it is possible to conceive; even the lips are contracted by the sneer of the author of "Don Juan." I do not know whether the noble lord, who lived in Venice for a long time and who must have visited the church of San Giorgio Maggiore, noticed as I did that unique resemblance, which must certainly have flattered him.

THE ARSENAL—FUSINE

Behind the church, which is built on the point of the island looking towards the Piazzetta and where the Austrians have established a battery of guns, stretch the warehouses and basins of the Franco Porto. You traverse, after having passed through a gate guarded by custom-house inspectors, great courts surrounded by high arcades, and reach a sort of tavern and osteria, the rendez-vous of sailors and gondoliers, who there enjoy the pleasure of drinking wine duty free, very much as our Paris workmen go and get drunk outside the city. The place is always filled with people, and the customers overflow outside on benches around wooden tables shaded by the church. Porters pushing hand-carts loaded with bales move in and out among the drinkers, whom they look at enviously, and by whom they will come and sit down when they have earned the few sous needed for their frugal orgies. Opposite the tavern a great empty warehouse looking like a casemate, whitewashed, with grated windows looking out upon a deserted lane, serves as a refuge to people who are troubled by the somewhat noisy gaiety outside, and lovers who seek solitude.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

There you are served with Adriatic trigli (mulletts) so appetising, so golden red, so bright, so brilliant in tone that you would eat them simply on account of their colour, even were they not the very best fish in the world. Peaches, grapes, a jar of Cyprus wine, and coffee compose a breakfast exquisite in its simplicity, and if by chance you have a good Havana cigar which you can smoke in your gondola as you return towards the Riva degli Schiavoni, I do not quite see what more you want in order to be happy, especially if the night before you have received satisfactory letters from home.

It is early, and before going to Fusine I shall have time to visit the Arsenal; not the interior, for that is now forbidden, but I am more interested in admiring the Lions of the Piræus, trophies won by Morosini during the Peloponnesian War, than vessels in process of building and endless rows of guns.

THE ARSENAL—FUSINE

The two colossi in Pentelic marble lack the zoölogical truthfulness which Barye would undoubtedly have imparted to them, but there is something so proud, so grandiose, so divine,—if one may say so of animals,—about them that they produce a striking impression. Their golden whiteness stands out admirably against the red façade of the Arsenal, which is composed of a portico covered with meritorious statues which the nearness of the splendid lions causes to look like dolls, and of two crenellated towers of red brick with bands of stone like the houses of the Place Royale in Paris. Though they are trophies of a defeat, they still preserve their haughty, superb, proud look, and these lions seem to remember in the City of Saint Mark the antique Minerva.

The gloomy loneliness of the Arsenal, with its vast basins, its covered building-sheds, in which it is said a galley could be built, rigged, equipped, and launched in one day, recalled to me the Arsenal at Cartagena in Spain, which was so active in the days of the invincible Armada. It was from this Venetian Arsenal that started the fleets that went to conquer Corfu, Zante, Cyprus, Athens, and all the rich, fair islands of the Archipelago; but Venice was Venice then, and the

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Lion of Saint Mark, now gloomy and defamed, had teeth and claws like the fiercest of heraldic monsters.

We passed between San Giorgio and the Giudecca Point, skirting closely its gardens and enclosures full of vines and fruit trees, and entered the lagoon properly so-called.

The sky was absolutely clear, and the light was so brilliant that the water shone like a sea of silver and the sky line was absolutely invisible. The islands showed like little brown spots, and distant craft seemed to sail in mid-heaven. The railway bridge, a gigantic work which links Venice with the mainland and which I saw far off on the right, offered a singular effect of mirage. Its numerous arches, repeated in the still, blue water, formed perfect circles and resembled those strange, round Chinese doors which are seen upon screens; so that the architectural fancy of Pekin seemed to have built this quaint avenue for the city of the Doges, the sky line of which, broken by numerous belfries and topped by the Campanile surmounted with its golden angel, showed in the most picturesque and unexpected fashion.

After having passed a fortified island, bearing on its summit a charming statue of the Madonna and a very ugly Austrian sentry, I followed one of the canals in the lagoon buoyed by a double row of poles which mark the places where the water is sufficiently deep; for the lagoon is a sort of salt marsh which the ebb and flow of the tide prevent from stagnating, but which is never more than three or four feet deep except along certain lines deepened by nature or by man. Some of the piles have at the top little miniature diptychs made by pious sailors, which contain images and statues of the Madonna. The gracious protectress, who is called in the litanies Stella Maris, Star of the Sea, is there in her element. These Madonnas in the water are touching. Undoubtedly the Deity is present everywhere, and His protection falls from heaven as quickly as it rises from the sea, but the pious belief in a more immediate succour, the protectress being transported into the very midst of the peril, has something childishly charming and poetic about it. I am very fond of these Venetian Madonnas, washed by the salt mists and struck by the wing of the passing gull, and I willingly say, as I pass them, "Ave, Maria, gratia plena!"

THE ARSENAL—FUSINE

The blue line of the Euganean Mountains showed faintly ahead against the tender blue of the sky, rather as a vein of deeper azure than a terrestrial reality.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The trees and houses on the shore, which I could already perceive, seemed on account of the curve of the sea to plunge half-way into the water, and the red campaniles on the islands appeared to spring from the wave like great branches of coral. A low shore covered with varied vegetation lay before me. I sprang out of the gondola; I had reached Fusine.

The ravages of the war had not been repaired at Fusine. Some of the houses, half ruined by cannon-balls, smashed by shells, spoiled, with their broken white walls, amid the luxuriant vegetation, looked like bones forgotten on a battlefield. A little rustic chapel is intact, either because it was respected during the fight, or because the dwelling of God was restored before that of men. The rich, damp soil, impregnated with marine salts, enriched with vegetable detritus, heated by the vivifying sunshine, has given birth in loneliness and solitude to a whole wild flora of those lovely plants which are called weeds because they are free. It is a virgin forest on a small scale. Wild oats wave on the edge of the ditches, the hemlock expands its umbellæ of greenish white, the wild mallow spreads its curled leaves and its pale-rose flowers, the wild convolvulus clings with its silver bells to the branches of brambles; the grass, which comes up to your knees, is diapered with innumerable unnamed flowers, little spangles of gold, azure, or purple cast here and there by the great colourist to break the uniform green tint. By the banks of the canals the water-lily displays its great viscous, heart-shaped leaves and its yellow flowers, the spear-head of the sagittaria trembles in the breeze, the loosestrife, with its willow-like leaf, bends under the weight of its purple spikes, the iris sends up its dagger-like leaf; the ribboned reeds, the flowering rushes, are mingled in the wildest and most picturesque disorder. Elders, hazels, shrubs, and trees which no one trims, cast a shadow flecked with sunshine over this rich mass.

THE ARSENAL—FUSINE

Quick, swift lizards with quivering tails traverse like arrows the narrow path where the tree-frog conceals itself in the rut full of rain water. Bands of frogs dive under the grasses of the Brenta as you pass by. A beautiful water-snake fearlessly indulges in the most graceful convolutions.

Weirs and locks, forming breaks in the scene, retain the water here and there; light brick arches, which serve the double purpose of counterforts and of bridges, frequently span the canal; but all is half ruinous, and invaded by the vegetation which slips into the place of the bricks or the stone. This neglect is regrettable from the point of view of the engineer, but from that of the painter it is quite otherwise. If moss cover the revetments, if wall plants disjoin the stones, if the reeds end by filling up the canals, it all looks well in the landscape.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

On returning, the gondolier took me through water-lanes with which I was not previously acquainted. Decaying cities are like dying bodies; life, confined to the heart, little by little deserts the extremities. Streets become depopulated, old quarters become solitary, the blood lacks the strength to flow through the veins. The entrance to Venice, coming from Fusine, is mournful. Only a few boats bringing goods from the mainland glide slowly over the sleeping waters by the side of the deserted houses. Palaces of exquisite architecture are windowless; the openings are closed by rough boards. The whitewash on the abandoned houses chips away, the moss spreads its green carpet over the substructures, shells and seaweed cling to the water-steps which crabs alone now ascend. At the windows of the few inhabited houses are rags hung out to dry, sole indication of the life of the wretched households which have taken refuge there. Occasionally a magnificently wrought iron grating, a balcony with complicated ornamentation, a broken coat of arms, slender marble columns, a mask, a sculptured cornice on a wall cracked, blackened, and guttered by the rain, degraded by carelessness, betoken former splendour and mark the palace of a patrician family which has died out or sunk into poverty. As one proceeds the painful impression is gradually removed, life is renewed, and it is with pleasure that one enters again upon the animated Grand Canal or the Piazza San Marco.

THE ARSENAL—FUSINE

Time had seemed short to me at Fusine; it was already the dinner hour. The crabs which swarm in the canals were beginning to show their ugly bodies and their crooked claws above the line traced by the water at the foot of the houses; a performance which they go through every evening at six o'clock as punctually as if regulated by a chronometer.

I dined that day at the Campo San Gallo, a square behind the Piazza in a German gasthoff, where I enjoyed the change from the vini nostrani to a glass of Münich beer. I dined there in the open air under an awning striped saffron and white, side by side with French painters, German artists, and Austrian officers; the latter short, fair, slender young fellows in close-fitting, elegant uniforms, very polite, very well-bred, with Werther-like faces and quite free from soldierly manners. The conversation was usually æsthetic, broken here and there by a complicated, laborious joke, a remembrance of Jena, Bonn, or Heidelberg.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

In the centre of the Campo rose the margin of a well where the women of the neighbourhood and the Styrian water-carriers came to draw water at certain hours. At the back was a little church bearing the arms of the Patriarch of Venice, the door of which, closed by a curtain, sent out a faint perfume of incense to mingle with the smells from the gasthoff kitchen, and from which the sound of prayer and of organ notes mingled with discussions on art and philosophy. From time to time some bat-like old women, their heads concealed within black hoods, vanished within after raising the portière.

Young girls, bareheaded and draped in brilliant shawls, passed by, fan in hand, smile on lip, brushing gently aside with their feet the festooned flounces of their skirts, and instead of entering the church, went into a narrow lane which leads from the Campo San

THE ARSENAL—FUSINE

Gallo to the Piazza. There passed by also stout priests with honest, jolly faces, going to some evening service. They wore purple stockings like bishops, and red shoes like cardinals, which, it is said, is a privilege of the Quarter San Marco, the patriarchal metropolis.

On a modest-looking house opposite the gasthoff was a slab in marble bearing a Latin inscription. It was there that Canova died. I cannot resist the pleasure of copying the beautiful and touching inscription, which may be translated thus for the benefit of ladies who do not know Latin, and of men who have forgotten it: "This house of the Francesconi, which he had preferred to more sumptuous hospitality because of the candour of a former friendship, Canova, easily prince of sculptors, consecrated with his last breath."

After I had despatched my modest repast, seeing nothing interesting on the theatre posters which covered the arcades of the Procuratie, I traversed the streets aimlessly, which is the best way to become acquainted with the familiar life of a people; for books speak scarcely of anything but monuments and remarkable things, leaving out all the characteristic details and the innumerable, almost imperceptible differences which remind you constantly that you are in a foreign land.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

THE ACADEMY

AT the entrance to the Grand Canal, by the side of the white church della Salute and opposite the red houses of the Campo di San Vitale — a point of view made illustrious by Canaletto's masterpiece — rises the Academia di Belle Arti, where, thanks to the late Count Leopoldo Cicognara, have been collected a large number of the treasures of the Venetian School. The arcaded façade is from the design of Giorgio Massari, and the sculptor Giacarelli is the author of the "Minerva seated upon a Lion," which decorates the attic.

When the Venetian School is spoken of three names at once recur to the mind: Titian, Paolo Veronese, and Tintoretto. They seem to have been born spontaneously, like flowers, of the azure of the sea under a warm beam of sunshine. By the side of them one puts Giovanni Bellini and Giorgione, and that is all. I am speaking of the public and of ordinary amateurs who have not seen Italy, and who have not made a special study of Venetian painting. Yet there exists a whole series of artists, almost unknown, but admirable, who preceded the great men whom I have mentioned, as dawn precedes day, less brilliant, but more tender and fresher. These older Venetians join to all the artless delicacy, all the unction, all the suavity of Giotto, Perugino, and Hemling, an elegance, a beauty, and a richness of colouring which these never attained. It is remarkable that the paintings of the school of colourists have almost all turned black; the harmony of the tints has disappeared under smoky varnish, the glacis is faded, the first sketch shows through the overlaying; while the works of the school of line painters, with their timid and minute methods, their lack of thick colouring, their very simple local tone, preserve incomparable brilliancy and youth. These panels and canvases, anterior often by as much as a hundred years to the famous paintings, seem, but for the style which indicates the date, to have been painted yesterday. They still possess the bloom of novelty; the ages have passed over them without leaving any trace. There is no re-touching, no re-painting about them. Is it because the colours used by these men were purer, chemistry not being then sufficiently developed to adulterate them or to invent other colours of uncertain effect and doubtful permanence? Or is it that the tones, left almost pure, as in illuminations, have preserved the same value as on the palette. I will not attempt to decide the question, but the fact, more marked here, is true of all schools which preceded what is called the Renaissance of art. The older a painting is, the better it is preserved. A Van Eyck is fresher than a Van Dyck, an Andrea Mantegna than a Raphael, and an Antonio de Murano than a Tintoretto. Frescoes exhibit the same difference; the most modern are the most damaged.

THE ACADEMY

TRAVELS IN ITALY

I was prepared, in a way, by the masterpieces scattered through the galleries of France, Spain, England, Belgium, and Holland, for the marvels of Titian, Paolo Veronese, and Tintoretto, nor did these great men disappoint me. They faithfully kept all the promise of their genius,—but I expected that. On the other hand I experienced a delightful surprise on beholding the works, little known outside of Venice, of Giovanni and Gentile Bellini, Basaiti, Marco Roccone, Mansueti, Carpaccio, and others whose names would make a catalogue were I to give them. It was like a new world. To find Venetian brilliancy in Gothic simplicity, the beauty of the South allied to the somewhat stiff forms of the North, Holbeins as richly coloured as if painted by Giorgione, paintings by Lucas Cranach as elegant as those of Raphael, was a wondrous piece of good fortune, and I felt it perhaps more than was proper; for in my first burst of enthusiasm I was not far from considering the illustrious masters, the eternal glories of the Venetian School, as corrupters of taste and great men of the decadence, — somewhat like those Neo-Christian Germans, who drive Raphael from the paradise of Catholic painters because, in their opinion, he is too sensual and too pagan.

THE ACADEMY

If I were writing a history of Venetian painting and not an account of a trip, I should begin by Nicolo Semiticolo, the oldest in the series, who goes back to 1370, and I should come down chronologically to Francesco Zuccarelli, the last of them, who died in 1790; but the gallery is not so arranged, and this system, which should be followed everywhere, would not agree with the real places occupied by the pictures, which are hung up simply in accordance with their size.

The Academy of the Fine Arts, as is well known, occupies the old Scuola di Santa Maria della Carità. Of the original decoration there remains a very handsome ceiling in the first hall, which is the Salon Carré, the Tribuna of the Academy of Fine Arts. It is a casket in which the finest gems are placed in the most favourable light; the Koh-i-noors, the Grand Moguls, the Regents, and the Sancys of this rich Venetian mine, the veins of which have furnished such precious, picturesque gems.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Each great master of Venice is represented here by an eminent example of his talent, the masterpiece of his masterpieces, — one of those supreme paintings in which genius and talent, inspiration and skill are mingled in proportions not easy to recover, a rare conjunction even in the life of sovereign artists. On that day the hand could do whatever the mind willed, as in that place of which Dante speaks, “where one can what one wills.”

Basaiti's “Calling of the Sons of Zebedee” has many of the characteristics of the German School in the artlessness of the details, in the somewhat gray softness of tone, and in a certain melancholy unusual in the Italian School. The Nuremberg master would not disavow the landscape, at once fantastic and real, the Gothic castles with their pepper-pot turrets, their drawbridges and barbicans on the banks of the Lake of Tiberias, and a Chioggia or Murazzi fisherman would have no fault to find with the Péote and the nets rendered so simply and faithfully. The Christ is earnest and suave ; the faces of the two apostles who are going to give up the catching of fish for the catching of men breathe the liveliest faith.

THE ACADEMY

A stop must be made also before the "Saint Francis receiving the Stigmata," by Francesco Beccarucci di Conegliano, which is very fine. The painting is divided into two parts. In the upper is seen the saint holding out his hands for the divine imprints, a glorious resemblance with the Saviour which he has earned through his devotion. In the lower part is a crowd of saints and blessed, for the most part belonging to the order of Saint Francis, and rejoicing in the miracle. It contains beautiful ascetic heads ; it is filled with deep religious feeling, and is perfect though somewhat dry in execution. When these old paintings, apparently cold and constrained, are looked at attentively, they become animated little by little, and finally exhibit extraordinary vivacity ; yet they are marked neither by much knowledge of anatomy nor by much muscular or fleshy development. The figures, embarrassed, look like timid people who wish to speak to you and dare not, and are turning over the best way to express what they feel. Their gestures are often awkward, but their faces are so kindly, so sweet, so childishly sincere, that you understand their half-spoken words, and they remain forever in your memory. It is because, under their awkward appearance, they possess a small thing which is lacking in masterpieces of technical skill, — a soul.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

I own frankly that I have a horror of the Bassanos. Their everlasting paintings of animals turned out from their factory and scattered throughout Europe, wretched shoddy work reproduced mechanically, more than justify my aversion; but I am bound to confess that the “Resurrection of Lazarus” by Leandro Bassano is worth a good deal more than the entrances and exits from the Ark, the pastorals and the rustic parks with cattle and sheep and a bending woman in a red skirt, which drive to despair every visitor to picture galleries.

Let me mention also the “Wedding of Cana” by Padovanino, a large, fine composition, broad and correct in execution, a painting praiseworthy in every respect, and which anywhere else would be accounted a masterpiece; and let me come to a curious painting by Paris Bordone, which represents a gondolier restoring the ring of Saint Mark to the Doge. The moment chosen is that at which the gondolier is kneeling before the Doge. The composition is very picturesque. There is a great line, in perspective, of heads of senators, dark or bearded, most lordly in character; spectators are crowding on the steps in skilfully contrasted groups, while the beautiful Venetian costume is seen in all its splendour. As in nearly all the paintings of this school, architecture has a large place in the picture. Beautiful porticos in the style of Palladio, filled with people coming and going, form the background. This painting has the peculiarity, rather infrequent in the Italian school, — which is mostly occupied in reproducing religious or mythological subjects, — of representing a popular legend, a scene of manners, a romantic subject, in a word, such as Delacroix or Louis Boulanger might have chosen and treated in accordance with their talent. This gives it a characteristic appearance and a personal attractiveness.

THE ACADEMY

The pearl of the Museum at Madrid is a Raphael; the gem of the Museum at Venice is a Titian, a marvellous painting, long forgotten and then recovered, for Venice possessed this masterpiece unawares for many a year. Relegated to an old and little frequented church, it had disappeared under the slow accumulation of dust and cobwebs; the subject itself could scarcely be made out. One day an expert connoisseur, Count Cicognara, was struck with the appearance of the darkened figures, and suspecting the hand of the master under the marks of neglect and wretchedness, rubbed a corner of the canvas. The noble painting, preserved intact under the layer of dust like Pompeii under its mantle of ashes, appeared so youthful and so fresh that the Count was certain that he had come across a work by a great master,—an unknown masterpiece. He managed to master his feelings and proposed to the priest to exchange that huge, uncared-for painting for a fine, brand-new, clean, shining picture handsomely framed, which would do honour to the church and please the faithful. The priest joyfully accepted, smiling to himself at the eccentricity of the Count, who was giving a new picture for an old one and did not ask something into the bargain.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Cleansed from the filth which soiled it, Titian's "Assumption" appeared radiant. It is one of the largest paintings by the master, and the one in which he has reached the highest point. The composition is balanced and distributed with infinite art. The upper portion, which is arched, represents Paradise, —the Glory, to use the ascetic Spanish expression. Groups of angels confounded and disappearing in a flood of light to incalculable depths, like sparkling stars against flame, brilliant gleams of eternal light, form a halo around God the Father, who issues from the depths of the Infinite with the motion of a soaring eagle, accompanied by an archangel and a seraph upholding the crown and the nimbus. This figure of Jehovah, seen head and body strongly foreshortened horizontally, like a divine bird, with a mass of flying drapery outspread like wings, amazes by its sublime boldness. If it be possible for a human brush to clothe the Deity in a human figure, undoubtedly Titian has succeeded in doing so. Almighty power, eternal youth shine on the white-bearded face. Since the Olympic Jupiter of Phidias, never has the Lord of Heaven and Earth been more worthily represented.

THE ACADEMY

The centre of the picture is occupied by the Virgin Mary, who is raised, or rather surrounded, by a band of angels and of souls of the blessed. She needs no help to ascend to heaven. She rises through the upspringing of her robust faith, the purity of her soul, lighter than the most luminous ether. There is positively in that figure an incredible power of ascension; and yet to attain that effect, Titian did not have recourse to slender form, to clinging draperies, to transparent colour. His Madonna is a very real, a very living woman, of a beauty as solid as that of the Venus of Milo or the Venus of the Tribuna at Florence; full, rich draperies with numerous folds float around her; and yet nothing is more celestially beautiful than that tall, strong figure with its rose-coloured tunic and its azure mantle. In spite of the mighty voluptuousness of the body, the glance shines with the purest virginity.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

In the lower part of the painting the Apostles are grouped in various skilfully contrasted attitudes of ecstasy and surprise. Two or three small angels, who connect them with the middle portion of the composition, seem to be explaining the miracle. The heads of the Apostles, of various ages and characters, are painted with surprising vigour and lifelike reality. The draperies have the breadth and fulness characteristic of Titian, who was at once the richest and the simplest of painters.

THE ACADEMY

As I looked at that Virgin and compared it in my mind with other Virgins by different masters, I reflected how marvellous, how ever new a thing is art. The number of variations which Catholic painters have made upon this theme of the Madonna, without ever exhausting it, astounds and confounds the imagination ; but when one reflects upon it, one understands that under the conventional type each painter has reproduced at one and the same time his dream of love and the incarnation of his own talent.

Thanks to the dusty layer which covered it for so many years, the "Assumption" shines with youthful brilliancy. The centuries stayed their steps for it, and we enjoy the supreme delight of seeing a painting by Titian as it came from his palette.

Opposite Titian's "Assumption" has been placed Tintoretto's "Saint Mark delivering a Slave," as the most robust picture and the one best fitted to form a pendant to so splendid a masterpiece. Tintoretto is the king of violent painters. He has incredible fury in composition, vigour in execution, and boldness in foreshortening, and the "Saint Mark" may pass for one of his fiercest and most audacious paintings. The subject is the patron saint of Venice coming to the aid of a poor slave, whom a barbarous master torments and tortures because of the obstinate devotion of the poor fellow to the saint. The slave is stretched on the ground on a cross, surrounded by busy torturers who are making a vain effort to fasten him to the infamous tree. The nails turn back, the mallets break, the axes fly in pieces. More merciful than men, the instruments of torture are blunted in the hands of the torturers; the spectators look at each other and whisper in astonishment, the judge bends over the tribunal to see why his orders are not executed; while Saint Mark, in one of the most violent foreshortenings a painter ever risked, dives from heaven to earth, without clouds, wings, cherubs, without any of the aerostatic means usually employed in sacred pictures, as he comes to deliver the man who believes in him. This vigorous figure, with the muscles of an athlete and the proportions of a colossus, flying through the air like a rock hurled by a catapult, produces the strangest effect. The drawing is so marvellous that the massive saint sustains himself and does not fall. It is a downright tour de force. If to this be added that the picture is so strong in tone, so appropriate in its contrasts of light and shadow, so vigorous in detail, so harsh and violent in touch that the most intense Caravaggios and Spagnolettis, if placed by the side of it would look like rosewater, some idea may be had of a painting which, in spite of some barbarisms, still preserves in its accessories the architectural, abundant and sumptuous aspect peculiar to the Venetian school.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

THE ACADEMY

There are also in the same room an "Adam and Eve" and an "Abel and Cain" by the same painter; two magnificent paintings worked out like studies, which are perhaps the most perfect piece of work, so far as execution goes, produced by him. Against a background of soft, mysterious green, the distant foliage of Eden, — or rather, the wall of the studio, — stand out two superb bodies, of a brilliantly warm white, of living carnation, powerfully real. It is probable that Eve holds out to Adam the fatal apple, which justifies the placing of two nude personages in the open air; but no matter, for never did two more beautiful bodies, never did whiter and softer flesh come to life under the brush of a colourist. Tintoretto, who had written on the wall, "The drawing of Michael Angelo and the colouring of Titian," has in this painting carried out at least one half of his programme.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The companion painting of "Abel and Cain" breathes all the savage fury that one expects from such a subject and such a painter. Death, the consequence of the fall of our first parents, enters on the young earth in a formidable shadow, wherein are rolling the murderer and his victim. In one corner of the painting is a horrible detail: the head of a sheep cut off and bleeding. Is it the victim offered up by Abel, or a symbol that innocent animals are also to bear the penalty of Eve's curiosity?

Bonifazzio is an admirable artist. His "Wicked Rich Man" is a thoroughly Venetian painting. It lacks neither the handsome women with their hair rolled up in tresses, with strings of pearls, dresses of velvet and brocade, nor the splendid lords in gallant and courteous attitudes, the musicians, pages, negroes, nor the damask tablecloth richly covered with plate of gold and silver, the dogs playing on the mosaic pavement, and this time smelling at the rags of Lazarus with the mistrust of well-bred animals, nor the terraces with balustrades on which the wine is cooling in antique craters, nor the white columns between which the sky shines out deeply blue; only, Paolo Veronese's silvery gray here has an amber tint; the silver is gilded. Bonifazzio, who painted portraits, gave to his heads something more intimate than did the author of the four great feasts and of the ceilings of the Palace of the Doges, accustomed as he was to look at subjects from the decorative point of view. The faces in Bonifazzio's painting, studied and individually characteristic, positively recall the patrician types of Venice, which so often posed to the artist. The anachronism of the costumes shows that Lazarus is but a mere pretext, and that the real subject of the painting is a banquet of lords with courtesans, their mistresses, in one of those beautiful palaces which plunge their marble feet into the waters of the Grand Canal.

THE ACADEMY

Let us not pass too quickly before these "Apostles," of such fine port, so rich in colour, and so religiously grave, as is not always the case in the Venetian school, especially in the second half of the sixteenth century, when the pagan ideas of the Renaissance made their way into art and developed the sensualist tendencies of these splendid masters. The Academy of the Fine Arts possesses a great number of Bonifazzio's works. In this room alone, besides the "Wicked Rich Man" and the "Apostles," there is an "Adoration of the Magi," "Christ and the Woman Taken in Adultery," "Saint

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Jerome and Saint Catharine," "Saint Mark," "Jesus Enthroned surrounded by Saints," — all of them paintings of the highest merit, which stand being placed in company with those of Titian, Tintoretto, and Paolo Veronese.

A great painter, little known in France, is Rocco Marconi, an artist whose style is pure and whose feeling is deep. He is a sort of Italian Albert Dürer, less fantastic and chimerical than the German, but with a sort of archaic calm in his manner which makes him appear older than his contemporaries, as does Ingres among Delacroix, Decamps, Couture, Müller, and Diaz. The heads in his "Christ between Saint John and Saint Paul" have much character and nobility, the folds of the draperies are very tasteful, and the group in its firm colour stands out well against the sky dappled with clouds.

Here on the wall is a whole line of the old Venetians that I spoke of as we entered the Academy of the Fine Arts, suave, pure, ingenuous, gentle, and charming. Giovanni Bellini, Cima da Conegliano, and Vittorino Carpaccio each offer us the same subject, one which was sufficient for the whole of the Middle Ages and gave birth to thousands of masterpieces, — the Madonna and Child Enthroned, surrounded by saints, usually the patrons of the giver; a custom which makes pedants complain of anachronism under the pretext that it is not natural that Saint Francis of Assisi, Saint Sebastian, and Saint Catharine, or any other saint, should happen to be in the same frame as the Blessed Virgin, and that the costumes of the Middle Ages should be mingled with the draperies of antiquity. These critics have failed to understand that to a living faith there is no such thing as time or place, and that nothing is more touching than the bringing together of the idol and the devotee; a genuine bringing together, for the Madonna was then a living, contemporary, actual being, she entered into every one's life, she was the ideal of all timid lovers, the mother of all those who sorrowed; she was not relegated to the very confines of heaven, as incredulous ages, under pretext of respect, do with their gods. Men lived on a familiar footing with her, confided their griefs and their hopes to her, and no one would have been surprised to see her appear in the street in company with a monk, a cardinal, a nun, or any other holy personage. The more readily, therefore, did one allow in a painting a combination which shocks purists, but which is really deeply Catholic.

THE ACADEMY

TRAVELS IN ITALY

For my part I am very fond of these thrones and baldacchinos so preciously and delicately ornamented, of these Madonnas holding their Child upon their laps, with their simple golden nimbus, as if colour were not brilliant enough for them, of these little angels playing on the viol, the rebec, or the angelica. Yes, in spite of my love for pagan art, I love also these artless Gothic painters; these Fathers of the Church carrying great missals under their arms, wearing the cardinal's beretta, Saint George in his knightly armour, Saint Sebastian chastely nude, a sort of Christian Apollo, who, instead of shooting arrows, is pierced by them; the priests, the saints, and the monks in beautiful figured dalmatics and white or black gowns with many small folds; these young virgins leaning on a wheel and holding a palm, maids of honour of the Celestial Queen; all the loving and devout suite which humbly groups itself at the foot of the representation of the apotheosis of the Virgin Mother. It seems to me that this somewhat hieratic arrangement better fulfils the requirements of the church painting properly understood than compositions worked out from the realistic point of view. There is in this sort of composition a sacred rhythm which must strike the eye of the faithful.

THE ACADEMY

The aspect of the image itself, so necessary in devotional subjects, in my opinion, is preserved, and art is in no wise the loser, for if individuality is bounded on the one hand, it is entirely free on the other. Each artist marks his individuality in the execution of the work, and these paintings, formed of the same elements, are perhaps the most personal of all. The feathered musicians of Carpaccio are unlike those of Giovanni Bellini, although they are tuning their guitars at the feet of the Virgin on the steps of an almost identical baldacchino. The winged virtuosi of Carpaccio are more elegant, have a more youthful grace; they look like pages of a noble house. Those of Giovanni Bellini are more artless, childish, babyish; they perform their music with the zeal of country choristers watched by their priest. All of them are charming, but their gracefulness is different and marked by the character of the painter.

The "Holy Family" of Paolo Veronese is composed in the rich and bountiful taste so familiar to that painter. Of course the amateurs of absolute truth will not find here the humble interior of the poor carpenter. The column of rose Verona brocatella, the splendid figured curtain, the skilfully broken folds of which form the background of the painting, betoken a princely home, but the "Holy Family" is rather an apotheosis than a realistic representation of Joseph's humble household. The presence of Saint Francis offering a palm, of the priest in his cloak, of the saint with her golden hair tressed on the back of her head, the regal seat on which is enthroned the divine Mother presenting her Child to worship, suffice to prove this.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

In the second room there is an immense painting, "The Feast at the House of Levi," one of the four great banquet-pieces by Paolo Veronese. The Louvre possesses two of them, the "Wedding at Cana," and the "Supper at the House of the Magdalen." They are of the same size as the one at Venice. All have the same broad, rich, easy composition, the same silvery brilliancy, the same air of festivity and joy; in all are seen those dark-complexioned men with their rich dalmatics of brocade, the fair women covered with pearls, the negro slaves offering dishes and ewers, the children playing on the steps of balustraded stairs with great white greyhounds; the columns, the marble statues; the beautiful, bright turquoise-blue sky which fairly deceives when, on drawing back, one looks at it framed in by the door of the next room like a view in a panorama. Paolo Veronese is perhaps, without excepting Titian, Rubens, and Rembrandt, the greatest master of colour that ever lived. He has not the yellow tone of Titian nor the red tone of Rubens, nor the dark tone of Rembrandt. He paints luminously, with amazing accuracy; no one understood better than he did the relation of tones and their relative values. He obtains by juxtaposition tints of exquisite freshness which apart would seem gray and earthy. No one possesses to the same degree the bloom and flower of light.

THE ACADEMY

The composition of the "Annunciation" by the same painter is curious. The Virgin Mary, kneeling at one end of a long canvas, the central part of which is filled in by elegant architecture, awaits modestly the arrival of the Angel, relegated to the other end of the painting and which seems to be wafted towards her on its open wings with its angelic salutation. This arrangement, contrary to the rule which places in the centre of a canvas the group upon which attention is directed, is a brilliant caprice which would have failed had it been attempted by any other than Paolo Veronese.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The Academy possesses an inestimable treasure, the last painting done by Titian, that patriarch of his art, who lived through the century and whom the plague surprised still at work at the age of ninety-nine. The painting, of a grave and melancholy aspect, the funeral subject of which seems to be a presentiment, represents a "Deposition from the Cross." The sky is dark, a livid light illuminates the body piously upborne by Joseph of Arimathea and Mary Magdalen. They are both sad and downcast, and seem by their hopeless attitudes to despair of the resurrection of the Master. They are evidently wondering with secret anxiety whether that body anointed with spices and ointments which they are going to place within the sepulchre will ever emerge from it. And indeed, never did Titian paint so thoroughly dead a body. There is not a drop of blood left under the greenish skin and in the bluish veins; life has withdrawn from them forever. The "Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane" in Saint Paul's, the "Pietà" in Saint Denis-du-Saint-Sacrament, by Eugène Delacroix, alone can give an idea of the sinister and painful picture in which for the first time the great Venetian lost his unchanging serenity. The shadow of approaching death seems to combat the light of the painter who always had sunshine on his palette, and casts a twilight chill over the painting. The hand of the artist stopped in death before he had finished his task, as is testified by the inscription in black letters in the corner of the canvas: "The work which Titian left unfinished, Palma respectfully completed and offered to God." This noble, touching, and religious inscription turns the painting into a monument. Certainly Palma, himself a great painter, must have approached tremblingly the master's work, and his brush, clever as it was, must doubtless have hesitated and wavered many a time as it was laid on the touch of Titian.

THE ACADEMY

If the Academy possesses the Omega of the painter's life, the Alpha is also found there in the shape of a great picture, the subject of which is the "Presentation of Mary in the Temple." This work was painted by Titian when almost a child; tradition says at the age of fourteen, which seems to me rather precocious in view of the beauty of the work. Bringing the matter down to likelihood, "The Presentation of Mary" assuredly goes back to the painter's extreme youth. All the qualities of the artist are seen in this juvenile work; they were developed more fully later, but they exist already very visibly. The splendour of the architecture, the grand port of the old men, the abundant and fine drawing of the draperies, the great effects of tone, the manly simplicity of execution, — all these things reveal the master in the child. The luminous and bright colour, which the sunshine of mature age will gild with warmer reflections, possesses already the virile solidity, the robust consistency which are the distinctive characteristics of Titian.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

He is, in my opinion, the only wholly healthy artist who has appeared since the days of antiquity. He has the mighty and strong serenity of Phidias; there is nothing feverish, troubled, restless in him; the modern malady has not laid its hands upon him. He is beautiful, robust, and tranquil like a pagan artist of the finest epoch. His superb nature unfolds itself complacently in a warm azure, under a warm sun, and his colour recalls the beautiful antique marbles gilded by the brilliant light of Greece. There is no groping, no effort, no violence; he attains the ideal at the first attempt, without a thought. A calm, vivacious joy lights up his whole work. Only he does not seem to suspect the existence of death, save perhaps in his last painting. Without sensual ardour, without voluptuous intoxication, he exhibits to the gaze amid purple and gold, the beauty and the youth, all the amorous poetry of the feminine body, with the impassibility of a God exhibiting Eve to Adam. He sanctifies nudity by an expression of supreme repose, of ever fixed beauty, of the realisation of the absolute which makes the freest of the antique works so chaste. He alone has painted a woman who might, without appearing poor and mean, lie down by the side of the resting woman on the Parthenon.

THE ACADEMY

Giorgione has painted an episode of the fisherman bringing to the Doge the ring of St. Mark. It is the battle between Saint George and Saint Theodore and the fiends. However much I admire the warm, living, rich colour of Giorgione in his "Pastoral Concert," I confess I care very little for the painting in the Academy of the Fine Arts at Venice.

Rocco Marconi's "Descent from the Cross" has all the serious qualities, all the unction of the Gothic masters, their tranquil symmetry, and a richness of tone and a bloom of colour which the great paintings in its vicinity do not diminish. The dead Christ, recalling by His bloodless flesh the mat pallor of the Host, is sleeping softly on the Virgin's breast supported by a Magdalen of tender and delicate beauty, whose splendid fair hair falls in a golden cascade down a magnificent dress of figured damask of a rich, sombre purple like the ruby. Is it in the blood of the beloved heart that your dress has been dipped, O Magdalen, or in the drops falling from your own?

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Padovanino has a "Virgin in Glory" after the Spanish manner, but I am not very much struck, in spite of the great talent displayed in it, by the vast, apocalyptic painting by Palma the younger, "The Triumph of Death." Saint John, seated upon the rock at Patmos, gazes with upraised pen, ready to fix it on his parchment, at the formidable vision which is unrolled before him: Justice and War ride upon sombre steeds, and Death, upon his great pale horse, cuts in the human harvest ears which fall in sheaves of bodies along the edges of the road. Except Tintoretto, who with his tawny colour and violent touch can represent terror and tragedy, these gloomy subjects are generally ill-suited to Venetian painters, whose happy temperament delights in the azure of the sea and of the sky, in the whiteness of marble and of flesh, in the gold of hair and brocade, and the brilliant patterns of flowers and stuffs.

THE ACADEMY

A very curious painting by Gentile Bellini is "The Procession on the Piazza San Marco of the Relics preserved by the Brotherhood of Saint John," at the time when Jacopo Salis is making his vow to the Cross. No more complete collection of the costumes of the day can be imagined; the patient and minute touch of the artist has allowed no detail to escape him; nothing is sacrificed, everything is rendered with Gothic conscientiousness. Every head must certainly be a portrait, and a portrait as accurate as a photograph, with the colouring in addition. The appearance of the Piazza San Marco, such as it was then, is as true as an architectural drawing. The old Byzantine mosaics, which were restored later, adorn the portals of the old basilica, and—a point to be noted—the belfries are gilded all over, which was never really the case. But the belfries were to have been gilded, as a matter of fact. The Doge Loredan needed, to carry on the war, the sequins intended to pay for the gilding, and the plan was not carried out. There is no trace of it left save in the painting of Gentile Bellini, who had provisionally gilded his Saint Mark.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

A certain miracle of a cross fallen into the water from the top of a bridge in Venice, the bridge of Saint Leon and Saint Laurent, greatly interested the painters of that day. The Academy contains no less than three important paintings of this curious subject, one by Lazzaro Sebastiano, one by Gentile Bellini, and a third by Giovanni Mansueti. These paintings are most interesting, forming exceptions to the customary types of Italian painting, which turns in the narrow circle of devotional and mythological subjects and rarely touches the familiar scenes of real life. The monks of various orders, the patricians, the common people who are jumping into the water, swimming and diving in order to find the holy crucifix fallen within the canal, exhibit the strangest appearance. On the banks is the crowd in prayer, watching the result of the search. There is especially a line of ladies kneeling with clasped hands, covered with gems and pearls, in short-waisted dresses as in the time of the Empire, which exhibits a number of profiles set off one by the other with Gothic artlessness, and of extraordinary finish, beauty, elegance, and purity. In these paintings the old houses of Venice are seen, with their red walls, their windows with Lombard trefoils, their terraces surmounted by posts, their wide-topped chimneys, the old bridges spanned by chains, and the gondolas of other days, which are not the shape of modern ones. There is no felze, but an awning stretched upon hoops, nor does any one of them have the sort of fiddle-head in polished iron which serves as a counterpoise to the rower placed at the poop. They are also much less slender.

THE ACADEMY

Most elegant, most graceful, most juvenile is the series of paintings in which Vittorio Carpaccio has depicted the life of Saint Ursula. Carpaccio possesses the ideal charm, the youthful grace which Raphael exhibits in the "Marriage of the Virgin," one of the first and perhaps the most charming of his pictures. It is impossible to fancy more artless turns of the head, more angelically coquettish attitudes. There is especially a young man with long hair, seen from behind, whose cape with a velvet collar is half slipping from his shoulder, who is so proudly, so youthfully, and so seductively beautiful that he looks like Praxiteles' Cupid wearing a mediæval costume, or, rather, like an angel to whom it has occurred to dress himself up as a Venetian magnifico. I am surprised that the name of Carpaccio is not better known. He possesses all the youthful purity and all the graceful charm of the first manner of the painter of Urbino, and in addition the wondrous Venetian colour, which no other school was able to equal.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The Pinacoteca Contarini, the bequest of that lordly amateur of the arts who gave to the Museum his collection of arms, statues, vases, carved furniture, and other precious things, contains choice specimens of the Venetian and other schools. I will mention the "Pilgrims of Emmaüs," by Marco Marzali, painted with almost German dry minuteness; Andrea Cardegli's "Child Jesus, Saint John, and Saint Catharine," whose fair heads stand out against the green landscape background seen through a window; a "Virgin and Child with the Young Saint John," by Giovanni Battista Cima, somewhat dry and cutting too harshly against a background of blue mountains; a "Marriage of Saint Catharine," and a "Madonna and Child" by Francesco da Fiesolo, very sweet, pretty, and fresh, charming in its morbidezza. The triptych of "Fortune," by Giovanni Bellini is remarkable for its allegorical inventions. In the centre panel a nude woman stands upon an altar, accompanied by angels or Cupids playing on the drum; on the side panels a nude youth, crowned, a cloak on his shoulder, offers presents to a warrior who avoids him ; a woman holding a ball, her hair tressed into the shape of a helmet, stands in a boat, while Cupids play amid the waves like Tritons.

THE ACADEMY

Callot's etchings please me much more than his paintings, the authenticity of which is more or less doubtful. There is in the Pinacoteca Contarini a "Fair" by the Nancy engraver, swarming with Bohemians, charlatans, beggars, lansknachts, stealing, playing tricks, begging, drinking, gambling, — a view of that picaresque world which he knew so well ; but the artist is not as skilful with the brush as with the graver.

Let me close with the gem, the pearl, the star of this museum, — a "Madonna and the Child Jesus" by Giovanni Bellini. The subject is worn out, has been treated a thousand times, and yet it blooms with eternal youth under the brush of the old master. What does it consist of ? A woman with a child on her knees, — but what a woman ! Her face pursues you like a dream, and once you have seen it you never forget it. It is of impossible beauty, and yet strangely true ; it is of immaculate virginity and penetrating voluptuousness ; supreme disdain in infinite sweetness. I seemed, as I beheld that painting, to be looking at the incarnation of my secret dreams surprised in my soul by the artist. Every day I spent an hour in mute worship at the feet of the celestial ideal, and never could I have left Venice, if a young French painter, taking pity on me, had not made me a copy of that beloved head.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

TRAVELS IN ITALY

THE STREETS—THE EMPEROR'S FÊTE DAY

THE streets of Venice are rarely mentioned, although they exist in great numbers, and writers describe the quaintness of the canals and gondolas alone. The absence of horses and carriages gives to Venetian streets a peculiar appearance. By their narrowness they resemble the streets of Oriental cities. As the area of the islands is limited, and the houses generally very high, the narrow lanes which separate them look like saw-cuts in enormous blocks of stone. Certain calles in Granada and certain London alleys very closely approximate them.

The Frezzaria is one of the most animated streets of the city. It is quite six to eight feet wide, and is therefore analogous to the Rue de la Paix in Paris. It is in this street chiefly that are to be found the goldsmiths who manufacture those delicate little golden chains as tenuous as hairs, which are called jaserons, and which are one of the characteristic curiosities of Venice. With the exception of these chains and a few rough gems set in silver for sale to country people, which an artist may think picturesque, these shops have nothing remarkable. The fruiterers' shops have splendid stalls. The heaps of blooming peaches, the quantities of golden, amber-coloured, transparent grapes coloured with the richest tints, shining like gems, and the grains of which, strung in the form of necklaces and bracelets, would admirably adorn the neck and arms of some antique Mænad, are beautifully fresh and admirably grouped. The tomatoes mingle their brilliant scarlet with the golden tints and the watermelon shows its rosy pulp through the cleft in its green skin. All these lovely fruits, brightly lighted by gas-jets, show rarely well against the vine leaves upon which they are laid. It is impossible to regale one's eyes more agreeably, and often, without being hungry, I purchased peaches and grapes through sheer love of colour. I recall also certain fishmongers' stalls covered with little fishes so white, so silvery, so pearly, that I felt like swallowing them raw, after the manner of the ichthyophagists of the Southern seas, for fear of spoiling their tints. I could understand, on seeing them, the barbarous custom of ancient banquets, which consisted in watching the death of murænas in crystal vases in order to enjoy the opal tints which they assumed in their death throes.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

THE EMPEROR'S FÊTE DAY

In the evening these streets are extremely animated and brilliant. The stalls are illuminated a giorno, and the narrowness of the street prevents the light being scattered. The cook shops and the pastry shops, the osteria, the taverns, the numerous cafés, bloom and blaze; there is a constant going and coming of people. Every shop, without a single exception, has its miniature chapel adorned with a Madonna, in front of which are placed lighted lamps or tapers and pots of artificial or natural flowers. Sometimes it is a statuette in coloured plaster, sometimes a smoky painting, sometimes a Greek image with a Byzantine gold background, or a simple modern engraving. The Madonna replaces in devout Italy the Lares of antiquity. This form of the worship of the Virgin, so touching and poetic, has but few, if any, dissenters in Venice, and the followers of Voltaire would, so far, be ill-satisfied with the progress of enlightenment in the ancient city of the Doges. At nearly every street-corner, at nearly every descent of a bridge, there is in a niche, behind a grating or a glass pane, a Madonna on an altar adorned with wreaths of elder pith, necklaces of glass beads, paper flowers, dresses of silver lace, and all the pious rags with which the artless Southern faith overloads with childish coquetry the objects of its adoration. Candles and lamps continually burn before these altars covered with ex-votos, silver hearts, wax legs, women's breasts, paintings of shipwrecks seamed by lightnings, of burned houses, and other catastrophes, in which the wonder-working Virgin invariably turns up at the right moment. Near these chapels there is always some old woman praying, some young girl on her knees, some sailor making a vow or fulfilling it, and also at times people whose dress indicates that they belong to a class which with us does not possess so much faith, and leaves the religion of Christ to the common people and to servants. Contrary to preconceived ideas, I found Italy more devout than Spain.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

One of these chapels, near the Ponte della Paglia on the Riva degli Schiavoni, has always a large number of worshippers, either because it happens to be upon a frequented street, or because it possesses some peculiar privilege or immunity. There are also every here and there alms-boxes for the benefit of souls in Purgatory.

THE EMPEROR'S FÊTE DAY

The small coins dropped into them pay for masses for the poor forgotten dead.

Next to the Frezzaria, the street which leads from the Campo San Moisè to the Campo de Santa Maria Zobenigo is one of those which offer to a stranger the greatest number of points worthy of observation. Many lanes open into it as into an artery, for it connects the banks of the Grand Canal with the Piazza San Marco. The shops remain open longer than elsewhere, and as it is nearly straight, forestieri traverse it without being afraid of losing their way; a very easy thing to do in Venice, the maze of streets, complicated by canals and blind alleys, being so perplexing that it has been found necessary to mark by a succession of stones, on which are cut arrows indicating the way, the road from the Piazza to the railway station, situated at the other end of the city, near the Church degli Scalzi.

How often have I enjoyed losing myself at night in that labyrinth out of which a Venetian alone can find his way! After having followed a score of streets, traversed some thirty lanes, crossed ten canals, ascended and descended as many bridges, plunged at hazard into sottoportici, I have found myself just where I started from. These walks, for which I chose moonlight nights, enabled me to see Venice in its secret aspect, and from numerous picturesque and unexpected points of view.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Sometimes I came upon a great palace half in ruins, faintly showing in the shadows, thanks to a silvery beam; the panes left in its broken windows gleaming suddenly like scales or mirrors; now a bridge tracing its black arch against a stretch of bluish water over which floated a light mist; farther on a trail of red fire, falling from a lighted house upon the oily darkness of a sleeping canal; at other times a deserted square on which stood out quaintly the top of a church covered with statues which in the obscurity looked like spectres; or else a tavern where were gesticulating like demons gondoliers and facchini, their shadows projected upon the window; or else a half-opened water-gate through which a mysterious figure sprang into a gondola.

Once I thus reached a really sinister lane behind the Grand Canal. The high houses, originally covered with the red tint which is usually found upon old Venetian buildings, had a fierce and truculent aspect. Rain, damp, neglect, and the absence of light at the bottom of this narrow cut had little by little killed the colour of the façades and made the wash run. A faint reddish tint still marked the walls and looked like blood insufficiently cleansed off after the commission of a crime. Oppression, chilliness, terror, stole out from these sanguinolent walls; a sickly odour of saltpetre and well water, a mouldy smell reminiscent of prisons, cloisters, and cellars, seized me as I entered it. At the blind windows there was no gleam of light, no appearance of life. The low doors, studded with rusty nails, their iron knockers worn by time, seemed incapable of ever opening. Nettles and wall plants grew on the thresholds and seemed not to have been trodden for a long time back by any human foot. A lean, black dog which sprang suddenly out of the shadow like a jack-in-the-box, began to bark furiously and plaintively at the sight of me, as if it were unaccustomed to meet men. It followed me for a short time, tracing around me windings after the fashion of the poodle that accompanied Faust and Wagner on their walk; but looking at it fixedly, I said to it in Goethe's words: "Unclean animal, in vain you bark and open your mouth. You shall never swallow my monad." These words seemed to astonish it, and seeing itself discovered, it disappeared, uttering a lamentable howl. Was it a dog or a larva? This is a point which I prudently prefer to leave undecided.

THE EMPEROR'S FÊTE DAY

TRAVELS IN ITALY

I greatly regret that I do not possess Hoffmann's talent to turn that sinister street into the scene of a terrifying and strange tale, such as "The Deserted House," or "The Eve of Saint Sylvester," in which alchemists fight over a manikin, and hurl their microscopes at each other in a whirlwind of monstrous visions. The dark windows were meant to frame in the bald, wrinkled, grimacing heads, decomposed by a continuous metamorphosis, of Master Tabracchio, Spallanzani, Leuwenhoeck, Swammerdam, of Counsellor Tusman and Recorder Lindhorst. If Gozzi, the author of the "Contratempi," who believed himself the victim of the hatred of wizards and hobgoblins whose tricks he had discovered and whose secrets he had told in his fairy pieces, ever traversed this solitary lane, he must have met with some of the amazing misadventures reserved, apparently, for the poet of "Turandot," "The Love of the Three Orange Trees," and the "Blue Monster." But Gozzi, who felt the invisible world, must certainly have always avoided Barristers' Street at the hour of twilight.

On returning from one of these fantastic trips, during which the city had struck me as being more deserted than usual, I went to bed feeling rather melancholy, after having sustained against a monstrous mosquito — buzzing like a wasp, waving his antennæ, and twisting his proboscis like the god Ganesa, and making his saws scream with the most audacious ferocity — a terrible combat in which I was defeated and whence I issued full of many poisoned wounds. I was beginning to sink into the black ocean of sleep, so like death that the ancients called it its sister, when, through my dense somnolence I heard low rumours, distant thunder, and the sound of terrifying voices. Was it a tempest, a battle, a cataclysm of nature, a combat between demons? Such was the question which occurred to me as I woke. Soon a deafening clamour tore through my last vestige of sleep as forked lightning through a black cloud. The copper discs of the cymbals sounded like the clash of armour, gongs vibrated with hollow roar, the big drum boomed like a Malay or a hundred bulls, the ophicleides and trumpets let loose metallic hurricanes, the cornets à piston shrieked ragingly, the little flute made desperate efforts to rise above the noise and overtop it. All the instruments rivalled each other in riot and hurly-burly. It sounded like a Festival by Hector Berlioz going adrift at night on the waters. When this musical whirlwind passed under my balcony, I seemed to hear at one and the same time the trumpets of Jericho and the clarions of the Last Judgment. A tempest of bells, ringing full swing, formed the accompaniment.

THE EMPEROR'S FÊTE DAY

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The tumult proceeded towards the Grand Canal amid the red glare of many torches. It struck me that the serenade was somewhat uproarious, and I pitied with all my heart the fair for whom this monstrous nocturnal racket, this colossal hubbub, was intended. "Her lover is not very discreet," thought I to myself, "and he is not afraid to compromise his beauty. A guitar, a violin, a theorbo would, in my opinion, have been sufficient." I was just falling asleep as the noise died away, when a white blinding flash struck on my closed eyes like the livid lightnings illuminating the darkness of the deepest night, and a frightful explosion which made the panes rattle and the house tremble from top to bottom, broke the silence. I leaped three feet into the air, wondering whether it was a thunderbolt falling into the room, or the siege of Venice resumed without notice and a shell bursting through the ceiling and plumping down on me in the midst of my sleep. Similar deafening detonations were repeated every fifteen minutes until morning, to the serious damage of my windows and my nerves. They seemed to come from a very near point, and every time a livid flash foretold them. Between the discharges deep silence, the silence of death; none of the nocturnal sounds which are like the breathing of sleeping cities. In the midst of the uproar Venice, mute, seemed to have sunk and lost itself in the lagoons. Every window was dark; not a single gondola lantern starred the profound darkness.

THE EMPEROR'S FÊTE DAY

The next morning the riddle was read to me: it was the fête day of the Emperor of Austria; all this excitement was in honour of the German Cæsar. The batteries of the Giudecca and of San Giorgio Maggiore fired right opposite me, and many window-panes in the neighbourhood had been smashed. With dawn the row recommenced worse than ever. The frigates fired alternately with the batteries; the bells clanged in the innumerable belfries of the city; file firing and volley firing rattled over all at regular intervals. The burnt powder, rising everywhere in thick clouds was the incense destined to tickle the nostrils of the master, if from the height of his throne in Vienna he happened to turn his head towards the Adriatic. It seemed to me that in all these homages to the Emperor there was a certain ostentation of artillery, a certain double meaning in the musketry firing. These festival compliments in the form of cannon-shots had a second purpose, and one did not need to be clever to understand it.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

I hastened to the Piazza. A Te Deum was being sung in the Basilica. The garrison in full dress was drawn up in a square on the Piazza, kneeling and rising at a sign from the officers, as the service proceeded. A brilliant staff, covered with gold lace, was in the centre, sparkling brightly in the sunshine. Then at certain intervals the muskets were raised together, and admirably sustained file firing sent flying into the skies great white clouds of terrified doves. The poor pigeons of San Marco, terrified by the tumult and believing that, in violation of their immunities, they were to form the materials for an immense stew, did not know which way to turn. Crazed with terror they collided with each other in mid-air, struck against cornices, and flew off at top speed between domes and chimneys. Then, when silence came again, they returned to peck seed familiarly at their usual place at the very feet of the soldiers, so strong is the force of habit.

THE EMPEROR'S FÊTE DAY

All this was going on in the midst of complete solitude. The Piazza, always swarming with people, was deserted; a few strangers only were moving about in small, isolated groups under the arcades of the Procuratie; the infrequent spectators who were not foreigners betrayed their German origin by their fair hair and their square faces. There was not a single woman's face at any window, and yet the sight of handsome uniforms worn by good-looking officers is appreciated in every country in the world by the more graceful half of humankind. Venice, suddenly depopulated, looked like one of those Oriental cities in Arab tales, which have been laid waste by an angry enchanter. This uproar in deep silence, this excitement in emptiness, this vast display of force in isolation, had something strange, painful, alarming, supernatural about it. I felt a deep and singular impression in the presence of a people apparently dead, while its oppressors exulted in their joy, of a city which suppressed itself in order not to be present at the triumph. The non est raised to the state of manifestation, muteness that is a threat, absence that means revolt are the resources of the despair to which despotism drives the slave. Assuredly a universal howl, a general curse hurled against the Emperor of Austria could not have been more forcible. As Venice could not protest otherwise, it had surrounded the fête with void.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The discharges of artillery continued the whole day, and the regiments manœuvred on the Piazza and the Piazzetta, with myself as their only spectator. Weary of this monotonous diversion, I went for my favourite walk on the Riva degli Schiavoni, on which strolled a few Greeks and Armenians. There my ears were again torn by the guns of the frigate anchored in the port. At every discharge a poor little dog, tied by a rope to the mast of a Zante or Corfu vessel, sprang forward mad with terror and circled as far off as his leash allowed him, protesting as best he could against that stupid noise and yelping as if the sound hurt him. I was quite of the dog's opinion, and as I was not tied by a cord, I sailed off to Quintavalle, where I dined under the arbour at a sufficient distance from that hateful military uproar.

That evening there was no one at the Café Florian. Those who have lived in Venice can alone conceive the deep meaning of the fact. The flower girls, the caramel vendors, the exhibitors of Chinese shadows, and even the ruffians had disappeared. Chairs, benches, and galleries were deserted alike ; there was not a soul even in the church, as if it were useless to pray to a God who left the people in slavery. I do not know whether, that evening, the little tapers before the Madonnas at the street corners were lighted. The band at the retreat played, in deserto, a magnificent overture, German music too, — an overture by Weber, if I remember it rightly.

THE EMPEROR'S FÊTE DAY

Not knowing what to do with myself at the close of this lugubrious evening, I entered the Apollo Theatre. The auditorium looked like the interior of a columbarium ; the empty and sombre boxes, like niches from which the coffins had been removed. A few squads of Austrian soldiery were scattered upon the empty benches ; some dozen German functionaries, with their wives and children, tried to look as if they were many, and to simulate the public which had abstained from coming. But apart from the soldiers, the huge place did not hold more than fifty spectators. A wretched company played sadly and discontentedly behind smoking footlights a poor translation of a French play. A cold sadness, a deadly weariness fell from the ceiling like a wet, icy mantle. The dark theatre wore mourning for the liberty of Venice in the very face of the Austrians.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The next day the sea-breeze had carried away the smell of the powder, and the doves, reassured, swept down like snowflakes upon the Piazza San Marco, while all Venice was ostentatiously stuffing itself with ices at the Café Florian.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

SAN BIAGGIO—THE CAPUCHIN CONVENT

EVERY one, at least once in his life, has been unable to get rid of a musical phrase, a line of poetry, an expression dropped in conversation, heard by chance, and which pursues him everywhere with the invincible obstinacy of a spectre. A monotonous voice murmurs in your ear the accursed theme, a dumb orchestra plays it within your brain, your pillow repeats it, and your dreams whisper it; an invisible power forces you to mutter it stupidly from morning to night, as a devotee repeats his somnolent litany.

For a week past a song of Alfred de Musset's, an imitation, no doubt, of some old popular Venetian poetry, had fluttered about my lips, twittering like a bird, without my being able to drive it away. In spite of myself, I hummed in the most incongruous situations:

“At San Biaggio, on the Zuecca, you were very, very happy, at San Biaggio. At San Biaggio, on the Zuecca, we were happy indeed.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

“ But to remember it, will you take the trouble? But to remember it, and to return to it?

“ At San Biaggio, on the Zuecca, in the flowery meads vervain to pick; at San Biaggio on the Zuecca, there to live and die.”

The Zuecca — short for the Giudecca — was before me, separated only by the breadth of the canal, and nothing was easier than to go to that San Biaggio which the song describes as a sort of Cytherea, a languorous El Dorado, the earthly Paradise of love, where it would be sweet to live and die. A few strokes of the oars would have taken me to it; but knowing that one should never land upon fairy shores lest the mirage should vanish into haze, I continued to be unbearable with my refrain, “ At San Biaggio on the Zuecca,” which was turning into what is called in painters’ studios a bore. So my travelling companion, who for a week had borne with that cantilena as unendurable as the humming of a mosquito, unable to put up with it any longer, said sharply one morning to our young gondolier as he stepped into the craft, “ To San Biaggio on the Zuecca.” In order to break me of it, he was going to take me into my dream and my refrain, which is an excellent homœopathic remedy.

SAN BIAGGIO—CAPUCHIN CONVENT

Never a flowery mead did I come across at San Biaggio, and to my great regret, no vervain could I pluck. Around the church stretch market gardens in which vegetables take the place of flowers. Disappointed though I was, I could not help admiring the very fine grapes and splendid pumpkins. It is probable that when the song was written the point of the island was waste ground, the fresh grass of which was diapered with flowers in the springtime, and lovers walked hand in hand, looking at the moon. An old Venetian guidebook describes the Zuecca as a place full of gardens, orchards, and delightful spots. Poetic enthusiasm is killed when one finds instead of a dainty flower with tender colours and penetrating perfume, blooming on the green sward, big pumpkins turning yellow under broad leaves, and from that moment I ceased to sing, "At San Biaggio on the Zuecca."

In order to turn my trip to account, I proceeded along the island to the church del Redentore, situated near the Capuchin convent. The church possesses a fine Greek façade, elegant in style and harmonious in proportion, such as Palladio knew how to design. It is a kind of architecture which satisfies people of taste by its sobriety, its purity, and its true classicism. At the risk of being charged with being a barbarian, I confess that these façades give me very slight pleasure. In the case of Catholic churches, I believe only in the Byzantine, Romanesque, or Gothic styles. Greek art was so appropriate to polytheism that it is very difficult for it to express any other thought; hence churches built in accordance with its principles lack wholly the religious impress, in the sense which we attach to that word. The luminous serenity of antiquity, with its perfect rhythm and its logical forms, cannot render the vague, infinite, and mysterious meaning of Christianity; the unchangeable happiness of paganism does not understand the incurable Christian melancholy, and Greek architecture produces, as far as temples go, only palaces, exchanges, ball-rooms, and museums, more or less ornamented, in which Jupiter would be very comfortable, but in which Christ finds it difficult to dwell.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

But once the style of architecture is accepted, it must be admitted that the church del Redentore shows well on the banks of the canal in which it is reflected, with its great monumental staircase of seventeen marble steps, its triangular gable, its Corinthian columns, its bronze doors and statues, its two pyramids, and its white dome which is so effective at sunset when you are travelling in a gondola between the Public Gardens and San Giorgio Maggiore.

SAN BIAGGIO—CAPUCHIN CONVENT

The church was built in fulfilment of the vow of the Senate at the time of the plague of 1576, which caused frightful mortality in the city, and killed, among other illustrious personages, Titian, the patriarch of painting, laden with years and glory. The interior is very simple, and even somewhat bare. Whether the funds gave out or for some other reason, the statues which appear to fill the niches along the nave are mere shams, skilfully done in grisaille by the Capuchin Father Piazza. The niches themselves are real, but the statues, painted upon wooden boards cut out to shape, betray the sham by the lack of thickness when looked at in profile; if looked at from the front, the illusion is perfect.

As regards the paintings, it is the old story: Tintoretto, Bassano, Paolo Veronese. There are such numbers of excellent paintings in Venice that one almost gets tired of them, and ends by believing that in those days it was no more difficult to paint a splendid Venetian picture than it is to-day to scribble an article currente calamo; yet I advise the tourist to look at a Giovanni Bellini, of the greatest beauty, which adorns the sacristy. The subject is the Blessed Virgin and the Child Jesus between Saint Jerome and Saint Francis. The divine Mother contemplates with profound adoration the Child sleeping in her lap. Little smiling angels playing the guitar, flutter on an ultramarine background. Every one knows with what delicacy, with what refinement of sentiment, with what purity Giovanni Bellini paints scenes to which his brush is accustomed; but in this one, besides the artless charm of the composition, the Gothic fidelity of drawing, and the somewhat dry carefulness of the modelling, there is a brilliancy of colour, a golden warmth of tone which presages Giorgione; consequently some connoisseurs attribute this painting to Palma Vecchio. I believe it is by Giovanni Bellini. The unusual brilliancy of the colouring is due simply to the more perfect preservation of the painting. Venice is so naturally the place for colour that gray is impossible, even for line painters, and the most severely Gothic enrich their asceticism with Giorgione's amber.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

SAN BIAGGIO—CAPUCHIN CONVENT

Two or three Capuchins engaged in prayer would have given to this church, had the light been less brilliant, the look of one of those paintings by Granet which were so much admired a score of years ago. The good fathers were perfectly posed; all they needed was the dab of brilliant red on the ear. Another was humbly sweeping the choir, and I asked him whether we might visit the monastery. He very politely granted our request, and made us enter by a small side door leading from the church into the cloister.

I had long felt a desire to see the interior of an inhabited monastery. In Spain I had been unable to satisfy this religious and picturesque desire. The monks had just been secularised, and the monasteries, as was the case in France after the Revolution, had become national property. I had walked in melancholy fashion through the Carthusian Convent at Miraflores near Burgos, where I met only a poor old man dressed in a dark costume, something between a peasant's and a priest's dress, smoking his cigarette near a brazero, who guided me along the deserted passages and the abandoned cloisters on which opened the empty cells. At Toledo the Monastery of San Juan de los Reyes, a splendid ruined building, held only a few timid lizards and stray snakes which, at the sound of our steps, disappeared under the nettles and débris. The refectory was almost entire, and above the door a frightful painting exhibited a rotting body. The object was to kill the sensuality of the meals, which were, nevertheless, served with hermit-like austerity. The Carthusian Convent at Granada held only turtles, which dived heavily into the water from the edge of the fish-pond at the approach of visitors; and the magnificent convent of San Domingo, on the slope of Antequerula, listened in deep solitude to the murmur of its fountains and of its laurel woods.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The Capuchin convent on the Zuecca was quite unlike these wonderful edifices with their long white marble cloisters, their elegantly carved arcades, marvels of the Middle Ages or of the Renaissance, their courts planted with jessamine, myrtles, and rose laurels, their upspringing fountains, their cells through the windows of which one could see the soft, silvery blue of the Sierra Nevada. It was not one of those magnificent refuges in which austerity is but an additional delight to the soul, and in which a philosopher would be as happy as a Christian. The cloister was bare of architectural ornaments: low arcades, short pillars, a prison yard rather than a promenade for reverie. An ugly roof of staring red tiles covered the whole building; there was not even the severe and sad bareness, the gray, cold tones, the dimness of light which are favourable to thought; a harsh, brilliant light crudely lighted up the wretched details and brought out their commonplace meanness. In the garden, of which one caught a glimpse, there were rows of cabbages and vegetables of the harshest green, — not a shrub, not a flower, everything was sacrificed to strict usefulness.

SAN BIAGGIO—CAPUCHIN CONVENT

I next entered the interior of the convent, which is cut by long passages at right angles to each other. At the end of the passages there were chapels made in the wall and coloured with coarse frescoes in honour of the Madonna or some saint of the order. The windows, with their panes set in lead, admitted light, but did not produce those effects of light and shade which painters know so well how to turn to account. It seemed as though everything had been calculated in that building to produce the greatest possible amount of ugliness in the smallest possible space. Here and there were hung engravings pasted on canvas representing in innumerable small medallions all the saints, cardinals, prelates, and illustrious personages of the order, — a sort of genealogical tree of this impersonal and ever renewed family. Low doors marked at regular intervals the long white lines of the walls. On each was inscribed a religious reflection, a prayer, or one of those brief Latin maxims so full of thought. An image of the Virgin or a portrait of a saint, the object of special devotion on the part of the inhabitant of the cell, was added to the inscription.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

A great tiled roof covered, without touching them, the cells of these monastic bees, like a cover placed upon rows of boxes.

A bell sounded, calling either to a repast, to prayer, or some other ascetic exercise. The doors of the cells opened, and the passages, but now deserted, were filled with a troop of monks, who walked on two by two with bowed heads, their great beards spread over their breasts, their hands crossed within their sleeves, as they moved towards the part of the convent to which the bell was calling them. When they raised their feet, the sandals, as they dropped from their heels, tapped on the floor in a very monastic and lugubrious fashion and gloomily timed their spectral march. Some forty of them passed before us, and I saw nothing but heavy, dull, brutish faces without any character, in spite of their beards and their shaven polls. How different they were from the monk of San Servolo, consumed by fervour, calcined by faith, worn by macerations, and whose feverish eye shone with the light of the future life, an ecstasy betraying delirium,—Daniel among the lions.

SAN BIAGGIO—CAPUCHIN CONVENT

Certainly I had entered the convent with respectful, if not pious intentions. If I do not myself possess faith, I admire it in others, and if I cannot be a believer, at least I can understand others being so. I was therefore prepared to feel all the austere ardour of the cloister, and I was rather cruelly disappointed. The convent produced on me the effect of a lazaretto, of a lunatic asylum, or a barracks. The repulsive odour of a human menagerie rose to my nostrils and sickened me. It has been said of some holy personages that they were filled with the madness of the cross, stultitiam crucis; it seemed to me that these monks had the idiocy of the cross, and in spite of myself my mind rebelled and I blushed at such a degradation of creatures made in God's image. I was ashamed that a hundred men should collect in such a hole to be dirty and stink in obedience to certain rules in honour of Him who has created eighty thousand different kinds of flowers. The loathsome incense revolted me, and I felt towards these poor Capuchin fathers involuntary secret horror.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

When I left the convent two of the fathers who had business in Venice, asked us to take them in our gondola across the Giudecca. Through humility they would not accept the place of honour in the felze which we offered them, and they remained standing by the prow. They looked rather well thus. Their gowns of brown stuff fell in two or three heavy folds which Fra Bartolommeo would not have disdained when painting the gown of Saint Francis of Assisi; their bare, sandalled feet were very handsome, the great toe separated and the other toes long, like those of antique statues. I gave them a few pence to say some Masses on my behalf. The sceptical ideas which had worried me during the whole of my visit justified such Christian submission on my part, and if it was the devil who had suggested them to me, he must have been badly tricked and bitten his tail like an angry monkey. The good priests took the money, slipped it into the fold of their sleeve, and seeing that I was such a good Catholic, they gave me a few copper-plate engravings, which I have carefully preserved: Saint Moses the prophet, Saint Francis, a few other bearded saints, and a certain Veronica Giuliana, a Capuchin abbess (abbedessa cappuccina), with her head thrown back and her eyes filled with ecstasy, like those of Saint Teresa of Spain, who pitied the devil because he could not love.

SAN BIAGGIO—CAPUCHIN CONVENT

We landed the good fathers at the Traghetto di Moisè, and soon they disappeared in the narrow lanes.

My day had not been very favourable to my illusions. At San Biaggio on the Zuecca, pumpkins had taken the place of vervain, and where I had expected to find a sombre cloister with livid monks after the fashion of Zurbaran, I had found an ignoble home of Capuchins, with monks like those in Schlesinger's coloured lithographs. The latter disappointment was peculiarly painful to me, for I had long caressed the dream of ending my days under a monk's cowl in some handsome Italian or Portuguese convent, at Monte Casino or Maffra,—and now I did not feel at all like doing so.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

CHURCHES AND SCUOLE

WITH the exception of San Marco, a marvel which has no parallel save the mosque at Constantinople and that at Cordova, the Venetian churches are not remarkable for their architecture, or at least do not astonish a tourist who has visited the cathedrals of France, Spain, and Belgium. Save a few of the older and more interesting ones, they are all of the time of the Renaissance, and in the rococo style which very quickly followed in Italy the return to classical traditions. The former are in the style of Palladio; the latter in a particular style which I shall call the Jesuit. Nearly all the old churches in the city have unfortunately been restored in one or the other of these styles. Certainly Palladio, as is proved by so many noble buildings, is an architect of great merit, but he had not the least Catholic feeling, and he was better fitted to rebuild the temple of Diana at Ephesus and of Zeus Olympius than to construct a basilica for the Nazarene or any one of the martyrs of the Golden

CHURCHES AND SCUOLE

Legend. He sucked like a bee the honey of Hymettus, and flew by the passion-flowers.

As for the Jesuit taste, with its gibbous domes, its swelling pillars, its pot-bellied balustrades, its volutes like flourishes, its puffy cherubs, its wretched angels, its napkin-like cartouches, its chicories the size of cabbages, its unhealthy affectations, and its extravagant ornamentation which looks like excrescences on diseased stone, I confess that it inspires me with insurmountable repugnance. It is more than unpleasant, — to me it is disgusting. Nothing, in my opinion, is more contrary to the Christian idea than that loathsome heaping up of devout knick-knacks, that ugly, ungracious luxury, overdone, heavy, like the luxury of a new-made rich man, which causes the chapel of the Most Blessed Virgin to resemble the boudoir of an Opera chorus-girl.

The Church degli Scalzi is in this style, and is a model of extravagant richness. The walls, overlaid with coloured marbles, represent vast hangings of silk damask with white and green borders; the frescoed ceilings by Tiepoletto and Lazzarini, bright, light, clear in tone, with rose and azure as the keynote of the colouring, would be admirably suited to a ball-room or a theatre. The place must have looked lovely when it was filled with powdered abbés and fine ladies in the days of Cazenova and Cardinal de Bernis, while a musical Mass by Porpora was being performed by the violins and the chorus of the Fenice. Indeed, it would be the most natural thing in the world in such a place to worship the Eternal to a gavotte tune. How greatly I prefer the low Romanesque arches, the squat porphyry pillars, the antique capitals, the barbaric images standing out against a golden background in Byzantine mosaics, or the slender vaulting, the light columns, and the trefoil tracery of Gothic cathedrals.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

These architectural defects, — to which one has to be resigned in Italy, for all the churches are built more or less in that taste, — are compensated for by the number and beauty of the objects of art contained in the buildings. Even if one does not admire the casket, the jewels it holds compel admiration. Everywhere one comes upon Titian, Paolo Veronese, Tintoretto, Palma Vecchia, and Palma the younger, Giovanni Bellini, Padovanino, Bonifazzio, and other great masters. Every chapel has its own museum, of which a king would be proud. This very Church degli Scalzi, once you put up with the bad taste of it, contains some remarkable details. Its broad staircase of Verona brocatella, its handsome twisted pillars of red French marble, its giant prophets, its touchstone balustrades, its mosaic gates have a certain style about them and do not lack for grandeur. It contains a very fine painting by Giovanni Bellini, a "Virgin and Child," a magnificent bronze bas-relief by Sansovino representing scenes from the life of Saint Sebastian, and a group less severely artistic, but charming, by Toretto, Canova's master, — a Holy Family, Saint Joseph, the Virgin, and the Child Jesus. The Virgin has a delicate, plump face, the head is coquettishly posed, and her hands and feet are aristocratically small. She looks like a duchess of the court of Louis XV, and might very well represent Madame de Pompadour. Angels like ballet dancers accompany this pretty, worldly group. Assuredly it is not religious, but this mannered and clever grace has a charm of its own, and the decadent sculptor is still a great artist.

CHURCHES AND SCUOLE

The Church of San Sebastiano, built by San Serlio, is in some sort the Pinacothek and the Pantheon of Paolo Veronese. He worked in it for years, and rests there forever in the blaze of his masterpieces. His tombstone is surmounted by his bust, and bears his coat of arms, three trefoils on a field which I could not make out. We may admire this "Saint Sebastian" by Titian, with its fine old-man's head, its superb and magisterial port, and the pretty, artless movement of the child who holds the holy bishop's mitre. But I shall hasten on to the lord of the place, Paolo Caliari. The "Three Marys at the Foot of the Cross" are noticeable by the splendid composition and the richness of breadth characteristic of this painter, whom no one equalled in the art of filling spaces in great paintings. Brocade and damask are broken into rich folds, swell in splendid patterns, and the Christ from his cross of sorrows cannot help a faint half-smile, for the joy of being so admirably painted soothes his sufferings. The Magdalen is adorably beautiful; her great eyes are filled with light and tears, a tear trembles on her purple lips like a raindrop on a rose. The landscape background is unfortunately painted somewhat too much like a stage-setting, and its ill-connected distances are plainly weak to the eye. "The Presentation of Christ in the Temple" is also a very remarkable painting, in spite of the exaggeration of the figures placed in the foreground; but the head of Saint Simeon is full of divine feeling, and is marvellously painted, while the Child Jesus is foreshortened in the most amazing manner. In a corner of the painting a dog, with its nose turned up sadly, seems to bay at the moon. Nothing explains the presence of this isolated animal, but Paolo Veronese's fondness for dogs, especially for greyhounds, is well known. He has put dogs in all his paintings, and the church of San Sebastiano happens to possess the one and only picture in which he did not put any, so that it is pointed out as a unique curiosity in the master's work. I was unable to verify for myself the accuracy of the statement, but as I think it over, it does seem to me that a painting by Paolo Veronese always recurs to one's mind accompanied by a white greyhound, just as a painting by Garofalo is always adorned and signed with his invariable carnation.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

CHURCHES AND SCUOLE

The purest gem of those picturesque diamonds is the "Martyrdom of Saint Mark and Marcellus, encouraged by Saint Sebastian." Art can scarce go farther, and this picture must be reckoned among the seven wonders of human genius. What marvellous colour and drawing in the group formed of a woman and a child, which the glance first falls upon as one looks at the picture! What ineffable emotion, what celestial resignation overspread the faces of the two saints already radiant with the coming glory, and how charming is the woman's head seen in three-quarters above the shoulder of Saint Sebastian,—young, fair, filled with emotion, her glance sad and solicitous. The head, which is all that is visible of the figure, is so accurate in movement, so perfect in drawing, that the rest of the body can easily be guessed behind the group which conceals it; you can follow the lines down to the extremities, so exact is the anatomy. It is said that the Saint Sebastian is a portrait of Paolo Veronese himself, and the young girl that of his wife. They were both then in the flower of their age, and she had not yet bloomed out into the full, heavy, matronly beauty which is characteristic of her in the portraits we have of her—among others that in the Pitti Palace in Florence. The stuffs, the jewels, the accessories, all are finished with the extreme care and conscientious elaboration of early works, when an artist labours only to satisfy his genius and his art. It is almost immediately below this painting that the artist is buried. Never did a more brilliant lamp gleam over the shadow of the tomb, and the masterpiece shines above the dead like a dazzling apotheosis.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

CHURCHES AND SCUOLE

The "Coronation of the Virgin" is shown in the midst of a blaze, a display, a sparkling of light which never existed save on Paolo Veronese's palette. In an atmosphere of molten gold and silver which passes through the hair of the Christ, floats in mid-air a Mary of such celestially human beauty that your heart beats as you bow your head. The "Coronation of Esther by Ahasuerus" is of incomparable grandeur and richness of tone. Here Paolo Veronese gave full scope to his splendid manner; pearls, satins, velvets, and brocades gleam, shimmer, sparkle, and are broken by luminous folds. The warrior in the foreground, careless of the anachronism of his armour, has a proud and manly port; the inevitable great dog is well placed, evidently thorough-bred, and feels that it is an honour to be painted by Paolo Veronese.

In the upper portion of the church, in a part almost invisible from below, there are great monochromes by the master painted with exceeding lightness and a very fine effect. Damp, time, and the lack of attention have begun to destroy them; an Austrian shell which burst through the ceiling has scarred them with a broad cicatrice.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The sacristy also contains paintings by Veronese, but they belong to his early youth, when his yet timid genius was feeling its way.

There are several explanations of the prodigious number of paintings by him in this church: first, that he was specially devoted to Saint Sebastian; next, and more romantic, that having murdered a rival, he was compelled to seek refuge in this place, which he embellished out of gratitude during his long leisure hours; according to others again, the painter concealed himself for two years in San Sebastiano in order to escape the vengeance of a Senator, a caricature of whom he had exhibited on the Piazza San Marco. I repeat these stories for what they are worth, without taking the trouble to criticise them.

Santa Maria Gloriosa dei Frari is not in the hideous classical or Jesuit taste of which I was speaking a moment ago. Its ogees, its lancets, its Romanesque tower, its great walls of red brick give it a much more religious aspect. Above the doorway is a statue of the Saviour. The church, built by Nicolas Pisano, is of the year 1250. It is here that Canova is buried. The monument which the artist had designed for Titian, modified in some respects, was used for him. I do not much admire it; it is pretentious, theatrical, and cold. At the foot of a green marble pyramid placed against the wall of a chapel gapes the black door of a vault, towards which winds a procession of statues placed on the steps of the monument; at the head walks a funeral figure, bearing a sepulchral urn; behind, genii and allegorical figures carrying torches and garlands of flowers. To counterbalance this portion of the composition, a great nude figure, which I believe is symbolical of the brevity of life, leans upon a torch which it is putting out, and the winged lion of Saint Mark sadly leans its head upon its paws in a pose analogous to that of Thorwaldsen's famous lion. Above the door two genii hold a medallion portrait of Canova. The monument is all the poorer and the meaner in idea and execution that the Santa Maria dei Frari is full of the most effective ancient monuments in the finest style.

CHURCHES AND SCUOLE

The equestrian statue of General Colleoni, which looks uncommonly well upon a bronze horse, first strikes the eye as one comes up the canal to the small square at the back of which rises the Church di San

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Giovanni e San Paolo. Although built in the thirteenth or fourteenth century, the church was not consecrated before 1430. The pediment of the façade is pretty, the circular arcade which surmounts it is wondrously carved with flowers and fruits. People go there chiefly to see "The Martyrdom of Saint Peter" by Titian, a painting so precious that it has been forbidden to sell it under penalty of death. I like this artistic ferocity; it is the only case in which it seems to me that capital punishment should be inflicted. Yet, other paintings by Titian seem to me as worthy as this one, in spite of its beauty, of such jealousy on the part of Venice, and I had formed an idea of it different and greater than the reality turned out to be. The scene is in a wood. Saint Peter has fallen; the executioner has caught him by the arm and is raising his sword; a priest flees in terror, and in the sky appear two angels ready to receive the martyr's soul. The executioner is admirably drawn; he threatens and insults in rare fashion; a brutal, furious expression marks his face; his eyes shine under a low brow like that of a tiger; his nostrils are dilated and scent blood. But perhaps there is too much terror and not enough resignation in the face of the Saint. He sees the sword only, the cold steel of which will presently be thrust between his ribs, and he forgets that in the azure above soar celestial messengers with palms and crowns. He looks too much like an ordinary man condemned to death, whose throat is about to be cut and who is sorry for it. As for the monk, he is thoroughly frightened and filled with terror, but he does not run off properly. His body, much foreshortened, is ungainly; his legs are thrown back as he runs, his arms go one way and his head another. If the composition may be criticised, one has, on the other hand, to kneel in admiration before the magnificent landscape, so grand, so severe, so full of style, before the simple, manly, robust colouring, the broad and grand execution, the impassible masterliness of touch, the proud maestria which reveals the god of painting. Titian, as I have said, is the single artist whom the modern world can oppose to antiquity for calm strength, tranquil splendour, and eternal serenity.

CHURCHES AND SCUOLE

I might mention the funeral monuments which cover the walls: the altar of San Domenichino, on which the history of the saint is modelled in a series of bronze bassi-relievi by Mazza of Bologna; Tintoretto's "Christ on the Cross;" the magnificent carvings in the chapel of Santa Maria degli Rosi; the "Coronation of the Virgin," by Palma Vecchio; — but in a church where there is a Titian, you see nothing but Titian; he is the sun that extinguishes all the stars.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

San Francesco della Vigna, with its red and white belfry, also deserves to be visited. There is near the church a curious cloister, enclosed with gratings of dark wood, which surrounds a sort of green filled with wild mallow, nettles, hemlock, asphodel, burdocks, and other plants found in ruins and cemeteries, among which rises a grotto of rock-work and shells, within which is placed an effigy of Saint Francis, in wood or coloured plaster, a sort of devotional toy or Jesuit's fancy. Under the damp and mouldy arches of the cloister, among the tombs worn by time and inscriptions which are illegible, I noticed on a stone slab a gondola carved in very low relief but still quite plain. It is placed over a gondoliers' vault like the tomb of the Zorzi of Cattaro in the church of San Sebastiano. Each traghetto thus had its own separate burial-place.

At San Francesco della Vigna I saw a painting by Fra Antonio da Negroponte, remarkable for its beauty and its preservation. It is the only one by that painter which I have ever come across. I had never before heard his name, and yet it deserves to be known. The Virgin enthroned is dressed in a gown of gold brocade and a mantle figured with flowers painted in the most delicate manner. A little girl holds up the corner of the mantle with an air of ingenuous devotion, while the Virgin looks lovingly at the Child Jesus lying in her lap. The Virgin's head, with its exquisite delicacy, would do honour to Giovanni Bellini, Carpaccio, Perugino, Dürer, and the purest and most suave of the older masters. She is fair, and her golden hair, painted with great care, melts into the splendour of a trefoiled nimbus encrusted with precious stones after the Byzantine fashion. Above, from within the ultramarine of an artless paradise, the Eternal Father gazes upon the sacred group in a satisfied and majestic pose. Two handsome angels hold garlands of flowers, and behind the throne, covered with gold-work and enamels like that of an empress of the Lower Empire, bloom masses of roses and lilies which recall the sweet names given to the Virgin in the litany.

CHURCHES AND SCUOLE

The work is painted with slow minuteness and infinite patience, which seem to have paid no heed to time and which betray the ample leisure of the cloister; for Negroponte was a monk, as shown by the inscription upon the painting: "Pater Antonio Negroponte pinxit." But his extreme minuteness in no wise diminishes the grandeur of the impression or the imposing effect, while the richness of the colouring rivals the brilliancy of the gold and the ornaments in relief. It is at one and the same time an image and a jewel, as, in my opinion, paintings intended for the worship of the faithful should be. In that case art is improved by the hieratic and mysterious luxury of the idol. The Madonna of Fra Antonio da Negroponte at San Francesco della Vigna thoroughly fulfils these conditions, and stands perfectly being placed near "The Risen Christ" by Paolo Veronese, "The Martyrdom of Saint Laurent" by Santacroce, and the "Madonna" by Giovanni Bellini, which is one of his best works, though unfortunately it is placed in an obscure chapel.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

One should not neglect to visit San Pantaleone, if only to see the huge ceiling painted by Fumiani, representing different episodes in the life of the saint, his martyrdom and his glorification. Since the days of monastic stiffness and missal-like artlessness of

CHURCHES AND SCUOLE

Fra Antonio da Negroponte many years have passed and art has progressed. Whence is it, then, that this ceiling, which, so far as bold facility goes, equals Lemoine's ceiling in the Hall of Hercules and Luca Giordano's frescoes at the Escorial, leaves you cold in spite of the skilful foreshortening, of the elusive painting, and all the resources and tricks of execution? It is because in this case the means are the end, the hand works more quickly than the brain, and there is no soul in that vast composition suspended above your head like an actress at the Opera by plainly visible cords. The driest, most constrained, most unskilful Gothic possesses a charm which is lacking in all these great, mannered painters, so clever, so quick, so skilful, so expeditious in their mode of work.

In the Church of Santa Maria della Salute there is a superb ceiling by Titian, "The Murder of Abel by Cain," which is painted with masterly vigour and dash. It is at once calm and violent, like all the thoroughly successful works of this unrivalled painter. The church was built by Baldassare Longhena. The white cupolas have a very graceful curve. One hundred and thirty statues with flying draperies and elegantly mannered poses surround the cornice. When I lived in the Hôtel de l'Europe a very pretty Eve, in the costume of her day, smiled at me every morning from that cornice in a rosy ray of sunshine which flushed her marble with modest blushes. Religion is not prudish in Italy, and it willingly puts up with nudity when it is sanctified by art.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

I might continue indefinitely this pilgrimage from church to church, for they all contain treasures which deserve to be described ; but I have no intention of writing a guide-book, so we shall go straight to the Scuole di San Rocco, an elegant building composed of two orders of superimposed Corinthian columns which at one-third of their height are coupled by an exceedingly pretty fillet.

San Rocco, as every one knows, enjoys the privilege of curing the plague, so he is greatly venerated in Venice, which is particularly exposed to the pest through its relations with Constantinople and the Levant. The statue of the saint shows upon the bare thigh a horrible, inflamed boil, for the saints are homœopaths and cure only the diseases which they suffer from. The plague is treated by a plague-stricken saint, ophthalmia by a martyr whose eyes have been put out, and so on; it is really a case of similia similibus. Leaving the medical question aside, no doubt it was thought that these blessed personages would sympathise more deeply with evils from which they had suffered themselves.

CHURCHES AND SCUOLE

In the Scuole di San Rocco there is a low hall painted throughout by Tintoretto, that tremendous worker, and on ascending a magnificent and monumental staircase by Scarpagnino, there are on the right and on the left, as if to justify the name and patronage of the plague-stricken saint, different scenes in the great Venetian epidemic which might illustrate the cholera in Paris. These cadaverous paintings are, those on the right by Antonio Zanchi, those on the left by Pietro Negri.

It is also in the Scuole di San Rocco that is to be seen the masterpiece of Tintoretto, that fertile and uneven artist who passed from the sublime to the wretched with prodigious facility. The immense painting represents in full development the bloody drama of Calvary. It occupies the whole of the end of a large hall. The sky, painted, no doubt, with that blue Egyptian ash which has played such unpleasant tricks on the artists of that day, has most unpleasant false tones, which certainly could not have existed before that deceitful colour had darkened. It has also curiously darkened the background of the "Pilgrims at Emmaüs" by Paolo Veronese. The defect is quickly forgotten, however, so quickly do the groups in the foreground attract the attention of the spectator after he has looked at the picture for a moment. The Holy Women around the cross form the most profoundly despairing group that human grief can dream of; one of them, wrapped in her mantle, is prostrate, and sobs in the most pathetic and desolate fashion. A negro, who is endeavouring to raise the cross to which is fixed one of the thieves, is standing on tiptoe with an awkward, unnatural motion, but his figure is painted, like all the others, so vehemently and so furiously that you cannot help admiring it. Never did Rubens, Rembrandt, Géricault, or Delacroix in their most feverish and turbulent sketches, attain such dash, such rage, such ferocity. On this occasion Tintoretto fully deserved his surname Robusto. It is impossible to carry vigour farther. It is violent, exaggerated, melodramatic, but possessed of a supreme quality, strength. This painting, which shines with the splendour of sovereign art, makes one forgive the artist many acres of the smoky, black canvases which one meets with in every palace, church, and gallery, and which are the work of a dyer rather than of a painter. The "Crucifixion" is dated 1565.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

CHURCHES AND SCUOLE

Before leaving, a very beautiful "Christ" by Titian must be looked at, for its deep expression of grief, and also some lovely altar doors carved in 1765 by Philiberti with exquisite delicacy and amazing perfection of work. These carvings, which are precious in spite of their modern date, represent different events in the life of San Rocco. The wood-work in the upper hall is also very remarkable, but if we are to admire everything, we shall never get through.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

THE GHETTO—MURANO— VICENZA

ONE day I was wandering at haphazard through the unfrequented parts of Venice, for I like to learn something else about cities than that side of them which is drawn, described, and told by everybody, and I am always curious, having paid my legitimate tribute of admiration, to raise the mask of monuments which every city wears on its face by way of concealing its ugliness and its wretchedness. From lane to lane, by dint of crossing bridges and losing my way, I got beyond the Cannaregio into a Venice which is quite unlike the pretty Venice of water-colour paintings. Half-ruinous houses with windows boarded up, deserted squares, empty places on which clothes were drying upon cords and ragged children were playing, barren shores on which shipwrights were calking boats amid thick clouds of smoke; abandoned churches smashed by Austrian shells, some of which had burst even at this extreme distance; canals with green, stagnant water in which floated old mattresses and vegetable detritus, formed an ensemble of wretchedness, solitude, and neglect which made a painful impression upon me. Artificial towns conquered from the sea, like Venice, need riches and splendour; they require all the luxury of art and the magnificence of architecture to make up for the loss of nature. If a palace by Scammozzi, with its marble balconies, its pillars, and staircases, looks well on the banks of the Grand Canal, nothing, on the other hand, is more saddening than a wretched house falling to pieces between sky and water, and on the foundations of which crawl water-beetles and crabs.

THE GHETTO—MURANO—VICENZA

I had been walking for some time through a labyrinth of lanes which often brought me back to my starting-point. I noticed with surprise the absence of all religious emblems at the corners of the streets. There were no chapels, no Madonnas adorned with ex-votos, no carved crosses on the squares, no effigies of saints, not one of the outward signs of devotion which are so frequent in the other quarters of the city. Everything looked strange, foreign, and mysterious. Curious forms glided furtively and slowly along the walls with an air of terror. Nor were the faces of the Venetian type. Hooked noses, black eyes, sallow complexions, thin cheeks, pointed chins, all told of a different race. The wretched, shiny, dirty rags which these people wore were particularly sordid, and denoted cupidity rather than poverty, an avaricious wretchedness voluntary rather than involuntary, and calculated to inspire contempt rather than pity.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The lanes grew narrower and narrower; the houses rose like babels of superimposed hovels, as if in search of air that could be breathed and light to be reached above the shadow and the filth, in which crawled deformed beings. Several of these houses were nine stories high, — nine stories of rags, filth, and vile industries. All the forgotten diseases of the lazar-houses of the East seemed to cling to these deathly walls; the damp marked them with plague spots as if they were gangrened, the saltpetre efflorescence looked like the rugosities, warts, and boils of plague patients; the plaster broke away, like a diseased skin, in scaly pellicles. There was not a single perpendicular line; everything was out of plumb. The windows, blear-eyed, blind, or squinting, had not one whole pane; pieces of paper bound up as best they could the wounds of the glass. Poles like withered arms shook indescribable rags above the passer-by ; mattresses hideously soiled were endeavouring to dry in the sun on the edge of open, black windows. Here and there the remains of a cement formed of broken bricks and plaster gave to some of the façades less decrepit than the others an unwholesome redness like that which marks the cheek-bones of a consumptive patient or of low prostitute who has rouged her face. These houses were not among the least ugly and the least repulsive ; they seemed to be health in death, vice in misery. Which is the more horrible, a perfectly livid body or one with its yellow face rubbed with vermillion ?

THE GHETTO—MURANO—VICENZA

Ruinous bridges, their arches bending like old men bowed down by the weight of years, and ready to fall into the water, connected these masses of shapeless hovels, separated by stagnant, muddy canals, black as ink, green as sanies, filled with filth and detritus of all kinds which the tide was powerless to carry off, for it could not stir the heavy, thick, stagnant water, which resembled a Stygian swamp or a river of hell.

At last I came upon a broad square, fairly paved, in the centre of which showed the open mouth of a cistern. At one of the corners rose an edifice of a more human aspect, over the door of which was an inscription carved in Oriental letters, which I recognised as being Jewish characters. The riddle was solved. This fetid, purulent quarter was simply the Ghetto, the Jewry of Venice, which has preserved the sordidness characteristic of the Middle Ages.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Probably, if one were to enter these rotten, cracked houses rayed with loathsome mould, one might find in them, as in the Jewries of old, Rebeccas and Rachels of radiant Oriental beauty, stiff with gold and gems like Hindoo idols, seated on the most costly Smyrna carpets amid vases of gold and wondrous riches heaped together by paternal avarice; for the poverty of the Jew is merely external. If Christians indulge in sham luxury, Israelites indulge in sham poverty. Like certain insects, they roll themselves in the dirt and turn mud-colour in order to escape their persecutors. This habit, acquired in the Middle Ages, has never yet been lost by them, although nothing justifies it at present, but they keep it up with the unbending obstinacy of their race.

The building with the Hebraic inscription was a synagogue. I entered it. A fine staircase led me up into a large, oblong room wainscoted with well carved woodwork and hung with splendid red damask of the Indies. The Talmud, just like the Koran, forbids its sectaries to reproduce the human form, and considers art an idolatrous practice; consequently the synagogue is as bare as a mosque or a Protestant temple, and cannot equal the splendour of Catholic cathedrals, however wealthy the faithful may be. Jewish worship, which is wholly an abstraction, is poor to the eye; — a pulpit for the rabbi who explains the Scriptures, a gallery for the singers who chant the psalms, a tabernacle in which are enclosed the Tables of the Law, and that is all.

THE GHETTO—MURANO—VICENZA

I noticed in the Synagogue a great number of brass chandeliers adorned with balls and the arms twisted in the Dutch taste, such as are often seen in paintings by Gerard Dow and Mieris, especially in the painting of "The Paralytic," which engraving has made so popular. Probably these chandeliers came from Amsterdam, the northern Venice, which also contains many Jews. The superabundance of illumination is not surprising, for seven-branched candlesticks, lamps, and torches recur constantly in the Bible.

The Jewish cemetery is at the Lido. The sand covers it, vegetation grows over it, and children do not scruple to trample and dance on the overturned or broken tombstones. When they are reproached with their irreverence, they artlessly reply, "They are only Jews." In their eyes a Jew and a dog are one and the same thing. The field is not a cemetery, it is a common sewer. In Spain, at Puerto de Santa Maria, I met with something of the same sort. A negro, an attendant in the bull ring, had just been killed by a bull. He had been carried away, and I was much moved. "Don't worry," said a neighbour to me, "it is only a negro." Yet, Jew or negro, they are men. But how long will it be before we can teach that fact to the children of barbarians?

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The Christians sleep more peacefully on the small island of San Michele on the way to Murano. They are laid under the salt sand, which must be sweet to the bones of a Venetian, and the gondolas salute their crosses as they pass.

Murano has fallen from its antique splendour. It is no longer, as formerly, the wizard of imitation pearls, mirrors, and glassware. Chemistry has revealed its secrets; it no longer possesses the monopoly of beautiful bevelled mirrors, of tall glasses, of delicate flasks with milky spirals, of crystal balls that look like tears of the sea, of glass beads which clink on the loin-cloths of Africans. Bohemia does just as good work, Choisy-le-Roi does better; art at Murano has remained stationary amid universal progress. I visited one of the glass-works where were being manufactured small coloured beads.

THE GHETTO—MURANO—VICENZA

Murano contains another curiosity, which I was shown with some pride, — a horse, an animal more rare in Venice than the unicorn, the griffin, the chimera, or the flying ram of nightmares. In vain would Richard call, "A horse! a horse! my kingdom for a horse!" I rather enjoyed meeting that worthy quadruped, the existence of which I was beginning to forget. Meeting with it made me somewhat homesick for the mainland, and I returned to Venice very thoughtful. It struck me that it was a long while since I had seen plains or mountains, cultivated fields, roads bordered by trees, streets traversed by carriages; it seemed to me that nothing was pleasanter than the cracking of whips and the jingling of the bells of post-horses.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

PADUA

THE season was growing late, my stay in Venice had been prolonged beyond the limit which I had settled on in the general plan of my trip. I delayed my departure from week to week, from day to day, and always had some good reason for remaining. In vain did light vapours begin to rise in the morning over the lagoon, or sudden showers compel me to take refuge in a church; in vain when I wandered in the moonlight on the Grand Canal did the chill night-air force me sometimes to close the window of the gondola,—I insisted on setting at naught the warnings of autumn. I was always remembering a palazzo, a church, or a picture which I had not seen. I must visit, before leaving Venice, the white church of Santa Maria Formosa, made illustrious by the famous Santa Barbara, so splendidly posed, so heroically beautiful, which Palma Vecchio painted; and the palazzo of Bianca Capello, with its remembrances of a love-legend thoroughly Venetian and full of romantic charm ; the strange and splendid church of San Zaccaria, in which there are a marvellous altar-piece brilliant with gold by Antonio Vivarini, given by Helena Foscari and Marina Donato, and the tomb of the great sculptor Alessandro Vittoria, — a splendidly conceited epitaph, justified for once by a world of statues.

PADUA

“ Qui vivens vivos duxit de marmore vultus, — ”

Sometimes it was something else, — an island I had forgotten, Mazorbo or Torcello, which has a curious Byzantine basilica and Roman antiquities, or a picturesque façade on an unfrequented canal which I must sketch, — a thousand reasons of this kind, every one excellent, but which were not the real ones, although I did my best to believe they were. I yielded, in spite of myself, to the melancholy which seizes upon the most determined traveller when he is to leave, perhaps forever, a country he has long desired to see, a place where he has spent beautiful days and lovelier nights.

There are certain cities which one leaves as if they were a beloved friend, with swelling breast and tearful eyes ; chosen countries where one is more easily happy than elsewhere, to which one dreams of returning to

Has it ever happened to you to have but a few days to spend with some beloved person? You look at her long, fixedly, sorrowfully, to grave her features deeply in your mind; you look at her in every way, study her in every light, notice every particular sign,—the little mole near the mouth, the dimple on the cheek or the hand; you note the inflections and the harmony of her voice; you try to preserve as much as you can of the adored face, which absence will take from you and which you will never again see but in your heart. You cannot be apart, you must be together up to the last moment; even sleep seems to be stolen from these precious hours, and the talk is endless as you sit hand in hand unaware that the light of the lamp is paling and the gray dawn filtering through the curtains.

P A D U A

This was just my feeling with regard to Venice. As the moment of departure approached, it became dearer to me, its full value revealed itself as I was about to lose it. I reproached myself with not having turned my stay to better account; I bitterly regretted a few hours of laziness, a few cowardly concessions to the enervating influence of the sirocco. It seemed to me that I might have seen more, taken more notes, made more sketches, trusted less to my memory; and yet, Heaven knows that I conscientiously fulfilled my duty as a tourist. I was to be met with everywhere, in churches, in galleries, at the Academy of the Fine Arts, on the Piazza San Marco, in the Palace of the Doges, in the Library. My weary gondoliers begged for rest. I scarcely took time to swallow an ice at the Café Florian or a soup of mussels and a pasticcio of polenta at the Gasthoff San Gallo or at the tavern of the Black Hat. In six weeks I had worn out three pairs of eyeglasses, a pair of opera-glasses, and lost a telescope. Never did any one indulge in such an orgy of sightseeing; I looked at things fourteen hours a day without a stop. If I had dared, I would have continued my visiting by torchlight.

During the last few days it became a regular fever with me. I made a general round, a review, on the dead run, with the quick, sharp glance of a man who knows the thing he looks at and goes straight to what he wants. Like painters who ink the drawings which they do not wish rubbed out, I strengthened by a new remembrance the thousand sketches in my memory. I saw again the beautiful Ducal Palace, built purposely for a stage scene in a drama or an opera, with its great rose-coloured walls, its white lacework, its two stories of pillars, its Arab trefoils; wonderful San Marco, the Saint Sophia of the West, the colossal reliquary of Venetian civilisation, a gilded cavern, diapered with mosaics, a vast heaping up of jasper, porphyry, alabaster, and fragments of antiquity, a pirate cathedral enriched with the spoils of the universe; the Campanile, which bears so high within the heavens the golden angel, protector of Venice, and guards at its feet Sansovino's Loggetta carved like a gem; the Clock Tower, gold and blue, on which, on a great dial, meander the black and white hours; the Library, Athenian in its elegance, crowned with graceful mythological statues, sweet remembrance of neighbouring Greece; and the Grand Canal, bordered by a double row of Gothic, Moorish, Renaissance, and rococo palaces, whose ever varying façades amaze one by the inexhaustible fancy and the perpetual invention of the details, which it would take more than a man's whole life to study ; a splendid gallery in which is exhibited the genius of Sansovino, Scamozzi, Pietro Lombardi, Palladio, Longhena, Bergamasco, Rossi, Tremignana, and other wondrous architects, to say nothing of the unknown and humble workmen of the Middle Ages, who are not the least admirable. I went in my gondola from the Dogana Point to Quintavalle Point in order to fix forever in my memory that fairy sight which painting is as powerless to render as are words, and I devoured with desperate attention the mirage of the Fata Morgana about to vanish forever so far as I was concerned.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

P A D U A

Now, as I am about to bring to a close this account, already too long, perchance, it seems to me that I have told nothing and that I have but feebly expressed my enthusiasm and given but a poor copy of my splendid models. Every monument, every church, every gallery calls for a volume, and I can scarcely afford a page. Yet I have spoken only of what is visible ; I have avoided removing the dust from the old chronicles, reviving forgotten remembrances, peopling with their former inhabitants the deserted palaces ; — for that would have been a life work.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

And now, at any cost, I must go. Padua, the city of Ezzelino and of Angelo, calls me. Farewell, dear Campo San Moisè, where I have spent such lovely hours; farewell to the sunsets of the Salute, the moonlight effects on the Grand Canal, the beautiful, golden-haired girls of the Public Gardens, the pleasant dinners under the vines of Quintavalle! Farewell to the glorious art and the magnificent painting, to the splendid palaces of the Middle Ages, to Palladio's Greek façades! Farewell to the doves of San Marco and the gulls of the lagoon, to the sea baths on the Lido shore, to the trips in gondolas. Farewell forever, and if forever, still forever fare ye well! The railway has carried us off, and already the Venus of the Adriatic has plunged her rose and white body within the azure sea.

Padua is an ancient city which looks well against the horizon, with its belfries, domes, and old walls on which swarms a multitude of lizards. Placed too near a centre which draws all life to itself, Padua is a dead city, and looks almost deserted. Its streets, bordered by two rows of low arcades, are sad, and nothing recalls the elegant and graceful Venetian architecture. The heavy, massive buildings have a somewhat sour seriousness, and the sombre porches at the foot of the houses look like black mouths yawning with weariness.

PADUA

I was taken to a huge inn, probably a palace in olden days, the great remains of which, dishonoured by vulgar use, must of yore have seen better company. It was a journey from the hall to my room through numberless stairs and passages; a map or Ariadne's thread was needed to find the way.

My windows opened upon a fair prospect. The Brachiglione flowed at the foot of the wall, its banks lined with old houses and long walls, above which rose trees. Lines of stakes from which fishermen cast their lines with the patience characteristic of the breed in every country, huts with nets, and clothes drying at the windows, formed a pretty subject for a water-colour drawing.

After dinner I went to the Café Pedrocchi, famous throughout Italy for its magnificence. It is classical, monumental, full of pillars and columns, of ova and palmettos, in the style of Percier and Fontaine, all very large and very much in marble. The most curious things about it are great geographical maps which replace hangings and represent the different countries of the world on a large scale. This somewhat pedan-tic decoration gives an academic air to the room, and one would not be surprised to see a desk in the place of the counter, with a professor in his gown instead of the master of the café. But as Padua is a university town, it is quite proper that the students should be able to continue their studies while drinking their coffee or eating their ices.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The University of Padua was famous formerly. In the thirteenth century eighteen thousand youths, a nation of students, followed the courses of its learned professors, among whom later was Galileo, one of whose vertebræ is preserved as a relic,—a relic of a martyr who suffered for truth. The façade of the University building is very handsome; four Doric columns give it a severe and monumental aspect; but the class-rooms are empty and scarcely one thousand students now frequent them.

The next day I proceeded to visit the cathedral dedicated to Saint Anthony, who enjoys at Padua the position of Saint Januarius at Naples. He is the genius loci, the saint venerated above all others. If Cazenova may be believed, he was in the habit of working no less than thirty miracles a day. Certainly he deserved his surname Thaumaturgist, but his prodigious zeal has considerably fallen off. However, the credit of the saint has in no wise diminished, and so many masses are ordered at his altar that the priests at the cathedral and the days of the year are insufficient to say them. To settle up matters, the Pope has permitted that at the end of the year masses shall be said every one of which is as good as a thousand, and in this way Saint Anthony does not disappoint his faithful worshippers.

P A D U A

On the square near the cathedral rises a fine bronze equestrian statue by Donatello, the first cast since the days of antiquity, representing Gattamelato, a chief of condottieri, a brigand who unquestionably does not deserve such an honour; but the artist has given him a splendid port and a proud look, with his Roman emperor's baton, and that is quite enough.

The church of San Antonio is composed of a number of cupolas and bell towers, and a great brick façade with triangular pediment, above which rises a gallery with ogees and pillars. Three small doors cut in the high arcade correspond to the three naves. The interior is excessively rich, and is filled with chapels and tombs in different styles. It contains specimens of the art of various epochs, from the naïve, religious, and delicate art of the Middle Ages to the most extraordinary fancies of the rococo style. The cloister is paved with funeral slabs, and the walls disappear under the monuments which cover them. I read a number of the epitaphs, which were very fine, the Italians having preserved the secret of lapidary Latin.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Santa Giustinia is a huge church with a bare façade and an interior so plain as to be dull and mean. Good taste is certainly desirable, but not too much of it, and I must say I prefer to such bareness the mad exuberance and the exaggerated scrolls of the rococo style. A fine altar-piece by Paolo Veronese relieves the nudity. If the church is dull and characterless, the same cannot be said of the two giant monsters which guard it, lying on the steps like faithful mastiffs. Never did Japanese monsters present a more terrifying aspect than these fantastic animals, which are something like hideous griffins, with the hind-quarters of lions, the wings of eagles, and stupid, fierce heads, ending in beaks pierced with oblique nostrils like those of tortoises. These monstrous animals press to their breasts, between their talons, a warrior on horseback wearing mediæval armour, and crush him with slow pressure, with a vague look and without troubling about the convulsive efforts of the myrmidon thus stifled.

P A D U A

What is the meaning of the knight caught with his steed in the dread claws of these crouching monsters? What myth is concealed under that sombre sculptural fancy? Do these groups illustrate a legend, or are they simply the sinister hieroglyphs of fatality? I could not make out, and no one could or would tell me. The other day, on glancing over the album which Prince Soltykoff brought back from India, I found in the propylæa of a Hindoo pagoda exactly similar monsters crushing an armed man against their breast. Whatever may be the real meaning of these terrifying groups, they recall confusedly vague remembrances of cosmogonic combats, battles between the two principles of good and evil, — Ahriman overcoming Ormuzd, Siva overthrowing Vishnu. Later on, under the porch of the cathedral at Ferrara, I again saw these two chimeras, but this time it was lions they were crushing.

There is one thing one must not neglect to do in Padua, and that is to pay a visit to the Madonna dell' Arena, a church situated within a rich and luxuriant garden, and which would certainly never be found if one were not told of it. The whole of the interior was painted by Giotto. No gallery, no ribbing, no architectural division breaks the vast tapestry of the frescoes. The general aspect is of a sweet, starry azure, like a beautiful, calm sky; blue is the keynote and gives the local tone. Thirty compartments of great size, separated by mere lines, contain scenes of the life of the Virgin and of her divine Son in detail. They look like miniatures in a gigantic missal. The personages, through an artless anachronism most precious to historians, are dressed in the costume of Giotto's day.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Below these compositions, charming in their suavity and exhibiting the purest religious feeling, a painted plinth exhibits the seven capital sins symbolised ingenuously, and other allegorical figures in excellent style. A "Paradise" and a "Hell," subjects which greatly preoccupied the artists of that day, complete this marvellous ensemble. There are quaint and touching details in these paintings: children emerge from their little coffins and ascend to Paradise with eager joy, springing forward to play upon the flowery meads of the celestial gardens; others hold out their hands to their half-resuscitated mothers. I noticed that all the devils and vices were stout, while the angels and virtues were slender and thin. The painter thus denoted the preponderance of matter in some, and of mind in others.

P A D U A

Let me note here a picturesque and physiological remark. The type of the Paduan women differs greatly from that of the Venetians. In spite of the nearness of the two cities, the Paduan beauty is more severe and more classical. Thick brown hair, well marked eyebrows, a serious, dark glance, a pale olive complexion, a somewhat full oval, recall the main features of the Lombard race. The black cape which these lovely women wear gives them, as they glide slowly along the deserted arcades, a proud and shy look which contrasts with the faint smile and the easy Venetian grace.

On the Piazza Salone stands the Palace of Justice, a great building in the Moorish style, with galleries, pillars, and denticulated crenellations, which contains the largest room in the world perhaps, and recalls the Palace of the Doges at Venice. At the Scuole del Santo there are glorious frescoes by Titian, the only ones which this painter is known to have executed. There also are shown the instruments of torture, the racks, strapados, pincers, boots, toothed wheels, saws, axes, which were used upon the victims of Ezzelino, the most famous tyrant that ever lived, by the side of whom

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Angelo is an angel of light. I had a letter to the amateur who looks after this curious collection fit for an executioner's museum. I did not find him, to my great regret, and I left the same afternoon for Rovigo, quitting regretfully the delightful Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, which lacks nothing save liberty.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

FERRARA

AN omnibus took us in a few hours from Padua to Rovigo, which we reached in the evening. While waiting for supper, I wandered through the streets of the city lighted by a silvery moon which enabled me to make out the outline of the monuments. Low arcades, like those of the old Place Royale in Paris, border the streets, and the alternations of light and shadow formed long cloisters which that evening recalled the effect of the stage setting of the Nuns' act in "Robert le Diable." A few stray passers-by glided silently along like shadows; sorrowful dogs bayed to the moon, and the city seemed asleep. Every window was dark, with the exception of a few cafés still lighted, in which customers, with a weary, somnolent look, were eating ices and drinking coffee or a glass of water, slowly, wisely, methodically, often stopping to read a meaningless newspaper article, like people who have lots of time to waste and try to get along until it is time to go to bed.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The trip from Rovigo to Ferrara is in no wise picturesque, — a flat country with cultivated fields and Northern trees, exactly like a French department. The Po, with its yellow waters, is crossed; the low, bare shores faintly recalling those of the Guadalquivir below Seville. The turbulent Eridano, lacking the tribute of the melting snow, seemed calm and peaceful enough at the time.

Ferrara rises solitary in the centre of a flat country, which is rich rather than picturesque. On entering by the main street which leads to the square, the aspect of the city is imposing and monumental. A palace, reached by great steps, stands on the corner of this vast space. I suppose it must be the Court-house or City Hall, for people of all kinds came in and went out of the great doors.

While I was wandering in the streets, satisfying my curiosity at the expense of my appetite and stealing from the sixty minutes given us for breakfast forty to regale my eyes and fulfil my duty as a tourist, a strange apparition rose suddenly before me, as unexpectedly as a ghost at midday. It was a sort of spectre masked with a black mask, its head covered with a black hood, its body wrapped in a gown, or rather a domino, braided with red, with a red cross on the shoulder, a brass crucifix hung around the neck, and a red sash. It rattled in silence a small box in which money was jingling. This scarecrow, which had nothing living about it but the eyes which shone through the holes in its mask, shook two or three times before me its box, in which, terrified, I dropped a handful of bajocchi, not knowing for what charitable work this lugubrious figure was begging. He resumed his way without a word, with the most sinister, funereal clinking of iron and money, holding out his box, in which everybody hastened to drop some small coin. I inquired to what order belonged this phantom, more terrifying than the monks and ascetics of Zurbaran, who thus walked about like a horrid, nocturnal vision in the bright sunshine, realising in the street the nightmare of bad nights. I was told that he was a penitent of the Brotherhood of Death, begging money for the purchase of coffins and for the purpose of saying masses for poor devils who were to be shot down that very day,—brigands or Republicans, I have really forgotten which. These penitents have taken on themselves the sad and charitable task of accompanying those who are condemned to death to the place of execution, to be with them in their last moments, to remove from the scaffold the mutilated body, to place it in a bier, and to bury it in a Christian manner. It is townspeople who devote themselves through piety to these painful functions, and thus mingle a tender, though vague and masked element with the cold, implacable sacrifices of justice. These spectres seem to stand between the victim and the executioner. They are the timid protest made by humanity. Often these Sisters of Mercy of the scaffold turn faint and are more troubled than the condemned man himself.

F E R R A R A

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Italy has preserved largely the methods of Doctor Sangrado, and the breed of doctors whose system is developed in kitchen Latin in the ceremony of the "Malade imaginaire" has not yet disappeared. I say this with due reservation of talents of the first order. There are in the Peninsula numerous duplicates of Messieurs Purgon, Diafoirus, Macroton, Desfonandrès, and other doctors of Molière's creation. People are bled severely for the least indisposition. The barbers are the operators, so on their shops are seen paintings most surgically fantastic, and in these bloody subjects the painters do not hesitate at any violence of tone, and imagine contrasts which amaze colourists.

FERRARA

It was market day, which gave some animation to the city, usually so dull. I saw nothing characteristic in the way of costumes. Uniformity is overrunning everything. The peasants of the neighbourhood of Ferrara are very like ours, but for the Southern brilliancy of their black eyes and a certain pride of port which reminds you that you are on classical ground. Autumn products, grapes, pumpkins, pimentoes, tomatoes, mixed with coarse pottery and rustic household utensils, were heaped up on the square, amid which were groups of people talking and buying. A few ox carts, much less primitive than those of Spain, a few asses with wooden pack-saddles, were waiting with melancholy patience until their masters had finished their business and were ready to return home. The oxen, lying down, were peacefully chewing the cud; the asses were grazing the blades of grass growing between the paving-stones.

One thing peculiar to Italy is the open-air money-changers. Their outfit is exceedingly simple, and consists of a stool and a small table on which are ranged piles of scudi, bajocchi, and other coins. The changer, crouched like a dragon, watches his little treasure with a restless, yellow eye which exhibits constant dread of thieves, who are not kept away by any gratings.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The Cathedral, the façade of which rises on this square, is in the Italian Gothic style, so inferior, in my opinion, to Northern Gothic. The portal contains some curious details. The pillars, instead of resting on bases like ordinary pillars, rest upon chimeras in the style of those of the portal of Santa Giustinia at Padua. These heavy, crushed chimeras revenge themselves for the pain they suffer by tearing lions in the Ninevite style, caught in their claws. These caryatid monsters writhe horribly under the enormous pressure and are positively painful to look at.

The castle of the former Dukes of Ferrara, which is a little farther on, has a fine feudal aspect. It consists of a vast group of towers bound together by high walls, topped by projecting lookouts, and rising from a great moat full of water, which is crossed by a bridge closed to the public. Let not, however, what I have just said lead the reader to imagine a castle like those which bristle on the banks of the Rhine. Italian Gothic has not at all the same appearance as ours; no mould-covered stones, no mossy statues, no curtains of ivy falling over old, broken balconies, no traces of that rust of time which to us is inseparable from the monuments of the Middle Ages. Italian Gothic, in spite of its age, appears to be brand-new. It is white and rose, pretty rather than solemn, somewhat troubadour; in short, recalling the feudal clocks of the days of the Restoration. The castle of the Dukes of Ferrara, which is built of bricks and of stones turned red by the sun, has a bright, juvenile air which detracts from its imposing effect. It resembles too closely the stage-setting of a melodrama.

FERRARA

It was in this castle that lived the famous Lucrezia Borgia, whom Victor Hugo has depicted as so monstrous, while Ariosto speaks of her as a model of chastity, grace, and virtue, — the fair Lucrezia, who wrote letters breathing the purest love, and some of whose silky, golden hair Lord Byron possessed. There occurred the dramas of Tasso, of Ariosto, and of Guarini; there were held the brilliant orgies, mingling poisons and murders, which were characteristic of that period in learned, artistic, refined, and wicked Italy.

It is proper to visit piously the very doubtful cell wherein Tasso, crazed by love and grief, spent so many years, according to the poetic legend which has arisen since his day. I had no time to do so, and I did not regret it much. The cell, of which I have a very accurate drawing before me, has only its four walls with a low ceiling. At the back there is a window grated with thick bars and an iron-studded door with heavy bolts. It is most unlikely that in this obscure hole, covered with cobwebs, Tasso was able to work over his poems, to compose sonnets, to trouble about the details of his dress, such as the quality of the velvet of his beretta and the silk of his stockings, or to worry about cookery either, such as the kind of sugar which he wanted for his salad, that served him not being fine enough, in his opinion. Nor did I see Ariosto's house,—another obligatory pilgrimage. Apart from the little credit which can be given to these unauthenticated traditions, to these characterless relics, I would rather seek for Ariosto in the "Orlando Furioso," and for Tasso in "Jerusalem Delivered" or Goethe's splendid drama.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Life in Ferrara is concentrated on the Piazza Nuove, in front of the church, and around the castle. Life has not yet withdrawn from the heart of the city, but as you go farther from that point, the pulsations grow weaker, paralysis begins, death grows; silence, solitude, and grass take possession of the streets. You feel that you are wandering through a Thebaïd peopled by the shadows of the past, from which the living have disappeared like water that has dried up. There is nothing so sad as to see the body of a city falling slowly into dust in the sunshine and the rain ; human bodies at least are buried.

FERRARA

Bologna is a city with arcaded streets, like most cities in this part of Italy. They are useful as a shelter from the rain and sunshine, but they transform the streets into long cloisters, absorb the light, and give the towns a cold and melancholy aspect.

I had a letter of recommendation for Rossini, who unfortunately was absent and would return only a few days later.

I followed at chance a street which led me safely into the square, where have been leaning for years without ever falling the Torre delli Asinelli and the Garisenda, which had the honour of furnishing an image to Dante. The great poet compares Antæus bending towards the earth to the Garisenda, which proves that the inclination of the tower of Bologna goes back to the thirteenth century. These towers, seen by moonlight, had a most fantastic aspect. Their strange deviation from the plumb, giving the lie to all the laws of statics and perspective, makes you giddy, and causes the other buildings in the neighbourhood to seem themselves out of plumb. The Torre delli Asinelli is three hundred feet high, and is three and a half feet off the perpendicular. Its extreme height makes it seem slender, and I can best compare it to one of the great factory chimneys of Manchester or Birmingham. It rises from a crenellated base and has two stories also crenellated, the second one somewhat narrower. From the belfry which surmounts it there comes down a series of iron rods which reach to the foot of the building. The Garisenda, which is only about half as high as the Torre delli Asinelli, leans over frightfully and causes its neighbour to appear almost perpendicular. Although it has been leaning over thus for six hundred years, one does not like to stand on the side towards which it bends. You always fancy that the moment of its fall has arrived, and that you will be crushed under its stones. It is a childish impulse of terror which it is difficult to overcome.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

If the moonlight enabled me to see the towers, it was not sufficient to enable me to examine in the museum the paintings by Guido, the three Carracci, Domenichino, Albani, and the other great masters of the school of Bologna.

FERRARA

At four o'clock the next morning I dressed very sleepily to take the stage-coach for Florence. I observed a certain movement among the troops. It was an execution which was preparing. Some twenty people were to be shot that morning for political reasons. I left Bologna with the same painful impression which I had experienced at Verona and Ferrara and which awaited me at Rome; — but the thought of crossing the Apennines on that fine September day soon cleared away the lugubrious feeling.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

FLORENCE

THE road from Bologna to Florence crosses the Apennines, the backbone of Italy. There are certain names which cast a spell, even upon travellers most accustomed to disappointments. The name of the Apennines is of them. Unquestionably the mania for making comparisons is a mistake, and it is unjust to expect one place to be other than it is ; but I could not help, from the top of the stage-coach, thinking of the beautiful Spanish Sieras of which no one speaks and whose unknown beauty is far grander than that of the Italian mountains, which are perhaps overpraised. I recalled a trip from Granada to Veles-Malaga across the mountains, along a lonely track traversed by scarcely more than a couple of travellers in the course of the year, and which surpasses all that can be imagined in the way of effects of outline, light, and colour. I thought also of my excursion into Kabylia, of the mountains gilded by the African sun, of the valleys full of rose laurel, mimosas, arbutus, and mastic trees, through which strayed rivulets inhabited by little tortoises; of the Kabyle villages surrounded with fences of cactus, and of the broken horizon lines, over which rose always the mighty mass of Djourdjoura; and positively the Apennines seemed to me mediocre in spite of their classical reputation.

FLORENCE

Although the road never climbs such abrupt steeps as those of Salinas and Descarga in Spain, the hills are sometimes bad enough to make it necessary to employ oxen. It was an ever new pleasure to me to see the slow animals come along, their heads bowed under the yoke, their glistening noses, their great peaceful eyes, their strong legs. To begin with, they were always picturesque in themselves, and then there was always with them a rustic, wild oxherd, often of fine mien, with tousled hair, steeple hat, and brown jacket, carrying his goad like a sceptre. Besides, oxen to me always mean a rough tableland, a high plateau whence one enjoys unexpectedly a vast prospect, a blue panorama of plains, mountains, and valleys, the horizon full of towns and villas shimmering in the light and shadow.

As the slopes of the Apennines begin to sink towards Florence, the landscape improves in beauty. Villas show upon the sides of the road, black cypresses rise arrow-like, Italian pines outspread their green tops, olive trees open their gray, sad foliage. There is a bustle of foot-passengers, horses, and carriages, betokening the approach to a great, living city, a rare thing in Italy, that ossuary of dead cities.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Night had fallen when we arrived at the San Gallo Gate. For a city of pleasure and festivals, whose very name is scented like a nosegay, Florence received us in so strange a fashion that more superstitious persons might have been repelled by the apparent evil omen.

In the very first street into which the stage-coach entered, we met an apparition as dreadful as that of the Cortès of Death met by the ingenious knight of La Mancha in the neighbourhood of Toboso; only in our case it was not the decoration of an auto sacramental, but a horrid reality. Two files of black spectres, masked, bearing resinous torches which shed a lurid light with much thick smoke, walked, or rather ran behind and before a catafalque borne on men's shoulders, and the outline of which could be vaguely made out in the dun-coloured cloud of the funeral lights. One of these spectres sounded a bell, and all murmured with bocca chiusa under the beard of their masks the prayers for the dead in broken, stifled rhythm. A single black spectre would issue from a house and hastily join the sombre flock, which soon disappeared at the corner of a street. It was a brotherhood of Black Penitents who, according to their custom, were following a funeral.

FLORENCE

As soon as it was day, I looked out of the window to study the prospect unrolled before my eyes. The Arno, muddy and yellow, flowed between two stone quays, leaving half of its bed bare and showing in places the slimy bottom strewn with potsherds, rubbish, and detritus of all kinds. The spell of Italian names, which we meet with set in the verse of poets, is so great that their sonorous syllables always awaken in the mind an idea different from their aspect in reality. In spite of one's self, one imagines the Arno as a stream with silvery waters, flowery, verdant banks reached from terraces by marble staircases, and traversed at night by boats bearing lights, their Turkish carpets dipping in the tide, and sheltering under their silken awnings pairs of lovers. The truth is that the Arno should rather be called a torrent than a stream. It flows intermittently according to the caprice of the wet or dry weather, sometimes overflowing, sometimes a mere thread, and in Florence it resembles more the scene between the Pont de l'Hôtel-Dieu and the Pont-Neuf than anything else. A few fishermen standing in the water nearly up to their knees alone imparted any animation to the river, which on account of the constant change of height, carries only flat-boats; which is the more regrettable that the sea is very close, the Arno flowing into it after having traversed Pisa.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The houses on the opposite side of the quay were tall, of a sober and not very cheerful architecture. A few domes and distant church-towers alone broke the horizontal line. I caught sight, above the roofs of the buildings, of the hill of San Miniato with its church and its cypresses, the name of which had remained fixed in my mind, although I had never been to Florence, after I had read Alfred de Musset's "Lorenzaccio," the twenty-fifth scene of which is thus designated: "Before the church of San Miniato at Mount Olivet."

The handsome Ponte Santa Trinita, designed by Ammenato, rebuilt by Bartolommeo Ammanati, spanned to the right the river with its three light surbased arches. It thus offers less hold to the water in time of flood and inundation. It is adorned with statues of the Four Seasons, which from a distance have a fairly monumental effect. On the left was the Ponte alla Carraja, one of the oldest in Florence, for it goes back to the thirteenth century. Destroyed by an inundation, it was rebuilt by Ammanati.

FLORENCE

The general aspect of Florence, contrary to the idea which one has of it, is sad. The streets are narrow, the houses high, the façades sombre and lacking the Southern brightness which one expects to meet with. The city of pleasure, the summer residence of rich and elegant Europe, has a cross and dissatisfied look. Its palaces resemble prisons and fortresses. Every house seems to intrench itself and to defend itself against the street. The imposing, serious, solid architecture with very few openings has preserved the mistrust characteristic of the Middle Ages and seems to be constantly prepared for some sudden attack of the Pazzi or the Strozzi.

The Greeks had a particular way of expressing in a single word the central or important place in a city or country, — ophthalmos (the eye). Every great capital has its eye. In Rome it is the Campo Vaccino, in Paris the Boulevard des Italiens, in Venice the Piazza San Marco, in Madrid the Prado, in London the Strand, in Naples the Via Toledo. Rome is more Roman, Paris more Parisian, Venice more Venetian, Madrid more Spanish, London more English, Naples more Neapolitan in that particular privileged place than anywhere else. The eye of Florence is the Piazza della Signoria, a fine eye; for indeed, if you suppress that square, Florence loses its meaning, it might just as well be any other city.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The first view of the Piazza, with its graceful, picturesque, complete effect, makes one understand at once the mistake made in modern capitals like London and Paris and Saint Petersburg, which, under the name of squares, open up in their compact masses vast empty spaces on which they exhibit all possible and impossible failures in decoration. It is easy to understand why the Carrousel and the Place de la Concorde are nothing but great empty fields that absorb fruitlessly fountains, statues, triumphal arches, obelisks, candelabra, and gardens: all these embellishments, very pretty on paper, very good also, no doubt, seen from the car of a balloon, are practically lost to the spectator who cannot see them all at once. A square, in order to produce a fine effect, should not be too large; beyond a certain limit, the glance fails to grasp everything. Next it must be bordered by different buildings of varied heights. Tall buildings are elegant, and suitably circumscribe a square. Every detail can then be made out. It is just the difference between a painting standing up and a painting lying down, upon which you have to walk in order to see it.

FLORENCE

The Piazza della Signoria at Florence combines all the conditions of architectural picturesqueness, unity, and variety. Bordered by buildings which are regular in themselves but different one from another, it satisfies the eye without wearying it by cold symmetry. The Palazzo della Signoria, or Palazzo Vecchio, which at once attracts attention through its imposing mass and its severe elegance, stands at one of the corners of the square instead of being in the centre. This curious position, fortunate in my opinion, but regretted by those who can see nothing beautiful in architecture save geometric regularity, is not due to chance, but to a thoroughly Florentine reason. In order to attain perfect symmetry, it would have been necessary to build upon the detested ground belonging to the Ghibelline rebels, the proscribed house of Uberti. The Guelph faction, then all powerful, would not allow the architect, Arnolfo di Lapo, to do so. There are scholars who have cast doubts upon this tradition ; I shall not discuss the question here. What is quite certain is that the Palazzo Vecchio is much improved by the peculiarity of its position and thus leaves space for the grand Fountain of Neptune and the equestrian statue of Cosimo I.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The Palazzo Vecchio ought really to be called a fortress. It is a great mass of stone, without pillars, without façade, without architectural orders, forming a sort of huge square tower somewhat longer than it is wide, dentellated with battlements, and topped by a look-out which projects fairly well out. The stories are marked by ogival windows which cut like loopholes the thick walls of the massive edifice, and in the centre, like the donjon in the centre of a fortress, rises a high, crenellated belfry with a dial on the face which looks upon the square.

Time has gilded the walls with beautiful golden and russet tones, that contrast superbly with the clear blue sky, and the whole building has a haughty, romantic, fierce aspect that fully comes up to the idea which one has formed of the old Palazzo della Signoria, that has witnessed, since the thirteenth century, when it was built, so many intrigues, riots, violent deaths, and crimes. The battlements of the palace, squarely built, show that it was carried to that height by the Guelph faction; the bifurcated battlements of the belfry indicate a reaction and the accession to power of the Ghibelline faction. Guelphs and Ghibellines hated each other so intensely that they proclaimed their opinion in the fashion of their clothing, in the manner they cut their hair, in the way they fortified their homes. They dreaded nothing so much as to be mistaken one for the other, and made as marked a difference as they could between themselves. They had a private greeting, after the manner of the Free Masons and the Companions of Duty. By the characteristic crenellations, we may recognise in the old palaces of Florence the opinions of the former owners. The walls of the city are crenellated squarely after the Guelph fashion, and the tower of the ramparts opposite the Mall has the swallow-tailed Ghibelline crenellations.

FLORENCE

Under the arches which support the upper portion of the palace are painted in fresco the arms of the people of the Commune and Republic of Florence. After the expulsion of the Duke of Athens, whose romantic title makes one think of Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," Florence was divided into four quarters and sixteen banners, four standards to a quarter, and each had its arms.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The substructure of the Palazzo Vecchio consists of steps which formerly were used as a tribune from which the magistrates and demagogues harangued the people.

Two marble colossi, "Hercules and Cacus," by Baccio Bandinelli, and Michael Angelo's "David," stand on guard by the gate like two giant sentries whose relief has forgotten them. Bandinelli's "Hercules" and Michael Angelo's "David," have been subjected to criticism and admiration which do not appear to be entirely just. In my opinion, Bandinelli has been too much depreciated and Michael Angelo overpraised. The "Hercules and Cacus" has a haughty pride, a fierce energy, a feeling of grandeur, which mark the artist of the first rank. Never did Florentine exaggeration carry farther its swelling violence and its boastful anatomy. The network of muscles which uplift the monstrous shoulders is of amazing force, and Michael Angelo himself, when he saw this part moulded separately, could not refrain from approving of it. The torso of the Hercules has been greatly criticised by contemporary artists and sightseers. It is true that every detail is wrought out to exaggeration, the deltoid and pectoral muscles, the mastoidean ligaments, the modelling and the projection of the ribs, are brought out in extreme relief. It is an anatomical preparation carried to the third power; the artist has forgotten to put a skin over the bumps and projections, or rather, he would not do it; hence the comparison of the torso to a sack full of pine-cones. The reproach, which is not undeserved, might be addressed to many another Florentine artist, and even to the great Buonarrotti.

FLORENCE

Michael Angelo's "David," besides the fact that it represents in gigantic form a Biblical hero whose stature was notoriously short, seems to me rather heavy and commonplace, an infrequent defect in a master so rigorously elegant. David is a great, stout, healthy fellow, strong-backed, provided with solid pectoral muscles and monstrous biceps, a powerful porter waiting to load a sack on his back. The way the marble is worked is remarkable, and on the whole it is a good study which would do honour to any other sculptor than Michael Angelo, but it lacks the Olympic and formidable maestria which is the characteristic of the productions of that superhuman sculptor. I am bound to add that the artist was not fully free. He drew his David from a huge block of Carrara marble which had been cut a hundred years before by Simeone da Fiesole, who had tried to make of it a colossus, but had failed. Michael Angelo, then twenty-nine years of age, took up the work, and as he played with it, found a giant statue amid the shapeless attempts of Simeone da Fiesole. Some defects of proportion in the limbs,—a lack of marble,—and chisel marks plainly seen on the shoulders, denote the difficulty the great sculptor experienced in carrying out this singular tour de force, which consisted in putting one statue into the skin of another. Michael Angelo alone could indulge so strange a fancy.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Two other statues ending in Hermes, the one by Bandinelli, the other by Rossi, were formerly used as chain posts. That by Rossi represents a man ending in an oak trunk, as a symbol of Tuscan magnanimity and strength; Bandinelli's, a woman with a crown on her head and her feet caught in a laurel, the symbol of the supremacy in arts and courtesy of this happy land. Above the gate two lions support a cartouche with rays bearing this inscription:—

“Jesus Christ, Rex Florentini Populi, S. P. decreto electus.”
As a matter of fact, Christ was elected King of Florence on the motion of Nicolo Capponi in the Council of One Thousand, with the hope of securing popular tranquillity, for Christ could not be supplanted or replaced by any one. Nevertheless, this ideal presidency did not prevent the overthrowing of the Republic.

FLORENCE

The outer court, into which one enters through this gate, was restored by Michelozzo. His Renaissance taste blooms out in the architecture. Elegant columns supporting arches form a patio such as you find in Spanish houses. A fountain by the sculptor Taddi, from the designs of Vasari, built by order of Cosimo I, is placed in the centre and completes the likeness. The basin is of porphyry ; the water springs from the mouth of a fish choked by a beautiful bronze child, the work of Andrea Mocchi. Above the arcades are painted in fresco trophies, spoils, weapons, and prisoners chained to medallions which bear the arms of Florence and of the Medici.

One of the most interesting rooms in the Palazzo Vecchio is the great hall, which is of enormous dimensions and has its legend. When the Medici were driven away from Florence in 1494, Fra Girolamo Savonarola, who was at the head of the popular uprising, suggested the building of a vast hall in which the council of one thousand citizens could elect the magistrates and settle the affairs of the Republic. The architect Cronaca was charged with the work and carried it out with such marvellous celerity that Fra Savonarola caused the report to be spread that angels came from heaven to help the masons, and continued their work during the night. In this rapidly erected building Cronaca displayed, if not all his genius, at least all his skill. The plans and methods employed to resist the strains in the framing of the great ceiling, which is of enormous weight, are justly admired and have often been studied by architects.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

When the Medici returned and removed their residence from the palace which they had occupied on the Via Larga to the Palazzo della Signoria, Cosimo desired to change the council hall into an audience hall, and ordered the presumptuous Baccio Bandinelli, whose designs had captivated him, to make certain alterations. The sculptor, however, had overestimated his talent as an architect, and in spite of the assistance of Giuliano Baccio d'Agnolo, whom he called to his help, he worked for ten years without managing to get out of the difficulties which he had himself created. It was Vasari who raised the ceiling several feet, finished the work, and adorned the walls with a series of frescoes still existing, representing scenes in the history of Florence, battles, and stormings of towns, — all travestied after the antique manner, and mingled with allegories. These frescoes, painted with intrepid and skilful mediocrity are full of the commonplace exaggerated muscles and anatomical tricks customary at that time among the herd of artists. Although it is the history of Florence which is illustrated, it looks as if the people were Romans of old laying siege to Veïæ, or any other ancient city of Latium, so that the frescoes look like huge illustrations of “De Viris Illustribus.” This bad taste is shocking. What have classical helmets, striped cuirasses, and naked men to do with the war between Florence and Pisa and Sienna?

FLORENCE

I remarked a moment ago that colossal dimensions are unnecessary to produce striking effects in architecture. The Loggia dei Lanzi, the gem of the Piazza della Signoria consists of a portico formed of four arches, three on the façade and one on the side towards the gallery of the Uffizi. It is a miniature monument, but the harmony of proportion is so perfect that it gives a sensation of comfort. The neighbourhood of the Palazzo Vecchio with its great mass and its robust squareness brings out wonderfully the elegant lines of the arches and the pillars. Its principal charm is that, symmetrical in itself, it obeys the law of intersequence, which governs the monuments that surround it and which it interrupts. This diversity gives to the square a brightness which would have been quickly replaced by monotony, if the arches had been repeated on each side. The capitals of the pillars of the Loggia are in a Gothic and fantastic Corinthian style, in which the rules of Vitruvius have not been carried out. This fact in no wise diminishes their grace and their happy proportions. An open-worked balustrade crowns the building, which ends in a terrace of delicate and light design. Its name, Loggia dei Lanzi, dates from the time when the German spearmen or lancers had a barracks not far from there. Its purpose was to shelter the towns-people from sudden showers, and to enable them to converse on their business and that of the city. It was under this gallery, raised a few feet above the level of the square, that magistrates were invested with their functions, knights created, decrees of the government published, and the people harangued as from a tribune.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The Loggia is a sort of open-air museum. The "Perseus" by Benvenuto Cellini, the "Judith" by

FLORENCE

Donatello, "The Rape of the Sabines" by Giovanni da Bologna are framed in within its arches. Six antique statues, the cardinal and monkish virtues, by Jacopo Pietro, and a Madonna by Orcagna adorn the inner wall. Two lions, the one antique, the other by Flaminio Vacca, almost as good as the Greek lions in the Arsenal at Venice, complete the ornamentation. The "Perseus" may be considered the masterpiece of Benvenuto Cellini, an artist who is a great deal spoken of in France, though really little known. The statue, mannered in pose like all the works of the Florentine school, which carried very far the affection of contour and a desire for nobility in motion, is very seductive in its juvenile grace. This made-up pose, inferior no doubt to antique simplicity, nevertheless has a great charm; it is elegant and cavalier-like. The young hero has just cut off the head of the unfortunate Medusa, whose body, twisted with skilful boldness, forms, with its mass of limbs writhing in agony, a footstool for the conqueror's foot. Perseus, turning away his face full of compassion mingled with horror, holds in one hand his curved sword and with the other raises on high the petrifying, motionless, dead face with its hair of writhing serpents. The pedestal, which is another masterpiece, is adorned with bassi-relievi containing the story of Andromeda, small figures and foliage which exhibit the talent of Benvenuto the goldsmith. Below these small figures, which represent Jupiter standing and brandishing a thunderbolt, runs the threatening inscription :

TRAVELS IN ITALY

“Te, fili, si quis læserit, ultor ero, — ” which applies as much to Perseus as to the artist. This inscription with its double meaning, appears to be a warning from the swordsman sculptor to critics, who had better profit by it. Without being influenced by this rodomontade, I frankly admire the Perseus for its heroic grace and the beauty of its delicate form ; it is a charming statue, an exquisite gem ; it is worth all the trouble it has cost its author.

Donatello's “Judith” exhibits with rather alarming and repulsive pride, the head of Holofernes cut off. It fulfils under the arch of the Loggia the same function as Foyatier's “Spartacus” opposite the Palace of the Tuileries ; only the warning of Spartacus is dumb, while in order that Judith's warning should be in no wise ambiguous, there is engraved on the plinth this terrible inscription : “Exemplum salut publ. cives posuere MCCCXV.” Both the statues are in bronze.

FLORENCE

The "Rape of the Sabines" offered Giovanni da Bologna an admirable pretext for the exhibition of his knowledge of anatomy, and enabled him to show human beauty under three expressions; a beautiful young woman, a vigorous man, and an old man still splendid.

The Fountain of Neptune by Ammanati, which rises in monumental fashion at the corner of the Palazzo Vecchio in the empty space left by the razing of the home of the Uberti, is rich and grandiose in aspect, although it is inferior to the designs of the other artists which were rejected in favour of the favourite architect of the Grand Duke Cosimo I. The god, of colossal size, stands upon a shell drawn by four horses, two of white marble and two of veined marble. Three Tritons play at his feet, and the water falls in numerous jets into an octagonal basin, the four corners of which are adorned with bronze statues representing Thetis and Doris, marine deities, and children playing with shells, corals, and madrepores. Eight satyrs, also in bronze, masks and cornucopiæ complete this rich decoration, which exhibits already the pompous and mythological taste of the fountains in the gardens of Versailles, a taste which is believed to be French, but which is really decadent Italian.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The equestrian statue of Cosimo de' Medici, the best of the four which Giovanni da Bologna was lucky enough to make during his artist's life, is marked by great ease and nobility. The horse has a distinct motion in his short trot, the man sits well on the saddle and is not ridiculously historical. The half real, half historical costume of the Grand Duke has a fine monumental effect. The statue is in bronze, and proved very difficult to cast. Bassi-relievi representing scenes in the history of Cosimo are placed on the four faces of the pedestal. On one of them is seen the portrait of a dwarf jester whom the Duke was very fond of.

I must also mention, as being on this splendid square, the palace of the Ugoccini, said to have been designed by Raphael; its suave, pure style is indeed that of the master. Also the Pisani Roof, a historical roof which the Florentines caused the Pisan prisoners to erect as a mark of contempt, which covers the Post-Office. But I have described enough statues and palaces. Let us take a carriage and go to the Cascine, the Champs-Élysées of Florence, to see human faces and rest our eyes after all this marble, stone, and bronze.

The Florentine type differs essentially from the Lombard and Venetian types. We have no longer the regular, pure outlines, the somewhat full oval, the rich neck, and the happy serenity of form, the perfect healthfulness of beauty which strike one on the streets of Milan, where, as Balzac so truly says, "Janitors' daughters look like queens' daughters." One cannot understand in Florence the proud, pagan epitaph of some count or another whose tomb bore for sole inscription, "Fu bello e Milanese;" the grace and the bright gaiety of Venice are lacking here.

FLORENCE

Faces in Florence do not possess that antique cast which yet exists in the rest of Italy after so many centuries, so many successive invasions and so radical a change in manners and religion. They are plainly more modern. If it is impossible to mistake on a Paris boulevard a thoroughbred Neapolitan or Roman, a Florentine might easily pass unnoticed among Parisians. The strong Southern character which marks other Italians will not betray him. There is more caprice, more unexpectedness in the features of the Florentine men and women; thought and moral preoccupations leave visible marks on their faces and alter the modelling in an irregular fashion which improves the expression. The Florentine women, less beautiful than those of Milan, Venice, or Rome, are more interesting and appeal more to the mind. Their eyes are melancholy, their brow is at times dreamy, and some of them have a look of vague suffering, a wholly recent, Christian feeling which would be sought for in vain on Greek and Roman statues. Amid the classical Italian heads, the Florentine heads are bourgeois in the deepest and best sense of the word; they express not only the race, but the individual; they are not exactly human, they are also social.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

The Florentine artists, Andrea del Sarto, for instance, lack the serene beauty of Titian, the angelic placidity of Raphael. They reproduce a type which is at once humbler and more refined. One feels the reality through their ideal; they do not put upon their faces the mask of general regularity which the other great Italian masters have perhaps used too often. They venture oftener upon portraiture, and are not afraid to make use of a certain ugliness in order to reproduce character. On looking at their works one understands how some of their heads, unquestionably less beautiful than the types employed by the painters of the Venetian or Roman school, produce a deeper and more lasting impression.

FLORENCE

These generalisations, — which, of course, are subject to numerous exceptions, for there are regular Florentine heads, — are the result of observations I have made in the streets, at the theatres, at church, and on my walks; for is not the human face as worthy of attention as architecture? Is not the model as good as the picture, and the work of God as the work of art? And if I have looked too attentively at some fair passer-by, surely she was not more disturbed by it than would be a column or a statue.

The place in Florence which is most favourable to this kind of study, too frequently forgotten by artists in love with antiquity or art, is undoubtedly the Cascine, a sort of Tuscan Champs-Élysées or Hyde Park where, from three to five, crowd in buggies, tilburies, phaetons, coupés, landaus, and victorias all the rich, noble, elegant, and even pretentious people of the city. The Cascine (which means “dairy”) is situated outside the walls beyond the Frato Gate and extends along the right bank of the Arno for about two miles to the point where the Terzoli flows into the river. Through great clumps of tall old trees, pines, green oaks, cork trees, and other southern varieties, with resinous trees of the North, run sandy roads which end in a large open space equivalent to what the Spaniards would call the Salon of this fashionable drive. The great masses of verdure, bordered on the one hand by the gently flowing stream of the Arno, on the other framed in by the blue Apennines, the distant masses of which are seen dotted with villas and hamlets, compose in the splendid Southern light an admirable ensemble which it is difficult to forget. The Cascine has something more artlessly rural than its companion drives in Paris and London, and the influx of foreign elegance does not deprive it of an Italian simplicity graceful in its nonchalance. A very simple and quiet country house belonging to the Grand Duke is buried within this cool verdure, which Southern people appreciate more than we do, no doubt, on account of its rarity. In Spain I met with similar admiration for the shades of the Park at Aranjuez watered by the Tagus and filled with Northern trees.

TRAVELS IN ITALY

Some years ago, Florence, especially before political events had driven away rich tourists, was the drawing-room of Europe. Thither, from all points of the horizon, came the Englishman flying from his native fogs, the Russian throwing off the snows of a six-months winter, the Frenchman bound on the fashionable tour, the German seeking simplicity in art, the singers, the dancers who had retired from the stage, the doubtful lives and fortunes, the fallen queens, the sweet couples united at Gretna Green or simply before the altar of nature, the women separated from their husbands for some reason or another, the great ladies who had made a mistake, the princesses having in their train tenors or black-bearded youths, the dandies half-ruined at Baden or Spa, the victims of cards or of Parisian credit, the old maids dreaming of lively adventures; a whole curious society mingled with much alloy, but bright, witty, gay, looking for pleasure only, and spending money with the greater carelessness that Italian luxury is relatively economical. This influx of strangers has somewhat diminished, yet the Cascine still offers, from three to seven, according to the season, a very brilliant spectacle.

FLORENCE

When I reached it in my carriage, — for it would be bad form to go on foot, although the distance from the city is very small, — there was a very full reunion. The day was fine, the air soft, and the sun sent brilliant beams from between the dappled clouds. The open space of the Cascine was like a vast drawing-room. The carriages, drawn up in line, represented the arm-chairs and sofas. Ladies in full dress reclined in these carriages, the back seats of which were filled with flowers. Their lovers and friends visited them, just as one goes to call on a lady in her box at the opera, and chatted standing on the steps. The riders also took part in the conversation, seated upon spirited animals which they held in, exciting them to make them show off, bravely safe performances which always make a man appear somewhat of a hero in the eyes of the beloved. Meanwhile the flower girls with their baskets, which are no sooner emptied than they are filled again, pass from one carriage to another or stop horsemen and foot-passengers. They literally carry out Virgil's advice, —

TRAVELS IN ITALY

“Manibus date lilia plenis.”

They even seem to give them, although in reality they sell them. They are not paid at once, but from time to time you give them a small amount of silver or something else, which is more gracious, for these flower girls are usually young and pretty, there being a natural attraction between young and pretty girls and flowers.

Copyright 1901, By George D. Sproul.

Contents

INTRODUCTION

FORTUNIO

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

KING CANDAULES

By Heron

Ed. 1892

It is believed, by some, that the
I have come to the conclusion that

Contents

INTRODUCTION	Page	3
FORTUNIO	“	15
ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS	“	227
KING CANDAULES	“	287

F O R T U N I O

Introduction

HERE is a characteristically Romanticist work, or rather three works, the first of which is boldly, almost offensively intended as a demonstration of the Romanticist theories of art and manners. Fortunio was advertised, on its first appearance, as an "Incredible Tale." Was this meant as a concession to the common-sense and the artistic feeling of the readers of the book? By no means. The accurate epithet was intended rather to pique public curiosity, then whetted to the utmost by the extravagances of the Romanticist writers. The motive which inspired Gautier in the composition of this work, which even now enjoys considerable popularity in France, was the desire to indulge to the full his fervid imagination, and at the same time to make another pronouncement in favour of his peculiar views on art, peculiar in this that they ran counter to the sober understanding of many able minds of the day and especially to the notions, imperfect and commonplace, no doubt, of the mass of the readers of newspapers and light literature. These views, however, were not peculiar to Gautier in so far as he was a member of the Romanticist school, and an important one at that. All the young authors who had rallied round Victor Hugo, recognised for some years past as the standard-bearer of Romanticism, shared the opinions of Gautier on the question of "Art for art's sake," and the consequent necessity for shocking, as frequently and as violently as possible, the sense of decency that in spite of repeated attacks, still survived among the general public.

FORTUNIO

The greatest and most celebrated authors of the school, save Lamartine and Alfred de Vigny, had adopted the courtesan, of the worst and most contemptible type, as the natural heroine of their lucubrations. The chief in person, the monumental, cathedral, pyramidal Hugo, had devoted infinite pains to the rehabilitation of the abandoned female. His Marion de Lorme is too well known in this respect to render more than a passing allusion to it necessary. Alexandre Dumas had taken the woman in society and adorned her adultery with all the flashy colours and fine writing at his disposal. Petrus Borel, the lycanthrope, wrote novels at once unintelligible and vile; the whole band of hangers-on to the chief imitated the example set by him, and sang the praises of the fallen woman in the finest language they could command. It seemed as if French society were composed exclusively of young debauchees, old voluptuaries, and women, young and old, rotten to the marrow. The protests of the more respectable readers and artists were treated with contempt, hooted down, characterised as British cant and puritanical hypocrisy, and declared to spring from an impossibility on the part of the protestants to understand art or anything connected with it.

INTRODUCTION

Gautier, who never swerved from the application of the doctrine, could not possibly remain behind in the race, so his Fortunio, and, in a less degree, his Cleopatra and Candaules, were intended as a declaration of principles, though he had already stated these principles with sufficient clearness and vigour in his Mademoiselle de Maupin and its startling "Preface." Fortunio is in every respect inferior to that celebrated novel, and although Gautier declared that the "Incredible Tale," like the novel, was intended to be and actually was an exposition of Beauty in the highest and purest form, no comparison is possible between the genuine feeling for beauty, albeit too often enveloped in sensuality, which is the characteristic trait of Mademoiselle de Maupin, and the merely sensual and gross, nay, usually coarse and repellent Fortunio. The absurdities and extravagances which abound in this tale, and which recall the similar but more talented performances of the senior Dumas in the same line, lack everything that in the works of the latter attracts and retains the reader. The adventures of the hero in Gautier's absurdity are merely idiotically impossible. The adventures of Monte-Christo are improbable, assuredly, but not wholly wild and devoid of a shade of possibility. Besides, there is dramatic force and effect in all of Dumas' work, and there is absolutely none in Fortunio. It is so painfully plain that the author desires to startle, shock, and irritate decency and common-sense, that he ends by failing in his purpose. He actually wearies one, though it must be owned that this is truer of the foreign reader and of the more refined French public than of the mass of devourers of light literature, Fortunio, as has been stated, being still one of the most popular of Gautier's books, and even very modern critics still expressing admiration for it.

FORTUNIO

INTRODUCTION

Most of the performances of Fortunio are childishly ridiculous, where they are not low and disgusting. The description of the orgy with which the book begins, and in which Gautier evidently revels, may have pleased the Romanticists of his day, but it is merely sickening now. Neither art nor beauty in any form redeems this passage from wearisomeness. Nay, more: it is Gautier's evident intention to amaze his reader by a description of the most splendid luxury and to impress on the contemned bourgeois the fact that a Romanticist is intimately acquainted with all the details of the most refined wealth and taste. He simply succeeds in proving that he, like Hugo, his master and exemplar, is one of the most thorough-paced bourgeois that ever gaped in amazement and surprise at scenes that offer, in reality, neither real splendour nor real artistic interest.

Next to this motive — the stupefying of the average reader and the insistent proclamation of the doctrine of "Art for art's sake," — the most striking feature of the work is the additional proof it affords of the contempt of the Romanticists for woman. They looked upon her as merely a plaything destined to satisfy the carnal lusts of their heroes — and possibly themselves — or to play the part of an ornament in a room or at a feast, exactly like the vases and golden cups they are so fond of piling on tables and side-boards. In most of the Romanticist dramas and novels — with the exception, already noted, of Lamartine and Vigny — the part played by woman is that assigned to her in the East: that of ministering to the sensual satisfaction of man. In the whole range of that form of the literature of France, there are but few examples of female characters treated sympathetically and reverently. The wretched beings upon whom Gautier lavishes all the skill of an artist, are wholly contemptible, and not even his assertion, borrowed from Hugo, that the love Musidora feels for Fortunio suffices to wash away all her sins and to transform her into a pure and honourable woman, not all his casuistry can reconcile the reader to the acceptance of that character as that of a woman, any more than Hugo's magic verse accomplishes the same purpose in his Marion de Lorme. The tale is deliberately meant to be astonishingly immoral and improper, and yet it utterly fails of its purpose. It is simply absurd. The reader feels that there is beauty in the words, in occasional suggestions, but as for admiring the characters or being in the slightest degree influenced to evil by the pranks of the extremely inane Fortunio, he knows himself entirely safe from any such temptation.

FORTUNIO

INTRODUCTION

The other two tales, One of Cleopatra's Nights and King Candaules, are both infinitely superior to Fortunio. In both, Gautier has sought a sensual subject in order to apply once more his doctrine of Art, but in these two cases, and especially in the latter, genuine feeling for beauty and for the dramatic have swamped the merely gross side of the subject. The exotic has helped Gautier; an archeologist might find reason to differ with him and to criticise some of the details, but the general effect of the two tales is distinctly strong and interesting. There is a story — there is practically none in Fortunio; there is a drama, and a bloody one, quite in keeping with the manners of the times described; there are force and power, both of which are lacking in the other work; there is consistency in the characters of Cleopatra and of Nyssia. Indeed, in the latter there is a glimpse of a higher ideal of woman; of a woman to whom chastity and self-respect mean something, and who is the more attractive on that account. There is some analysis of sentiments and motives; not very deep, no doubt, but more than one meets with usually in the works of Romanticist writers.

FORTUNIO

Gautier's love of plastic beauty, his fondness for spectacular pomp, his enjoyment of the vast, the mighty, the huge, the colossal, his passionate love of colour in its most dazzling as well as in its most delicate manifestations, combine in these two tales to enchant and delight the reader. Here is no mere balderdash, no absurd attempt to amaze the profanum vulgus, whom he hates so cordially, but an artistic and dramatic representation of scenes from long vanished civilisations, from realms of tradition and legend, in which the imagination may freely indulge in its wildest flights, and yet is more under control because the desire to be archeologically accurate and to prove that a Romanticist can be reliably erudite checks the excesses in which Gautier has previously revelled.

Fortunio was published serially in le Figaro, from May 23 to July 24, 1837. It then bore the title l'Eldorado, and the name was changed only on the publication in book form in 1838. Another edition appeared in 1840, and in 1845 it was included in the Nouvelles, of which it has ever since formed part. One of Cleopatra's Nights was written for la Presse, in which it was published in instalments from November 29 to December 6, 1838. It is not probable that the subject was suggested to Gautier by the Ruy Blas of Victor Hugo, though the general drift is similar, and Gautier no doubt had talked Ruy Blas over with his great chief. In the original draft of the tale, Gautier introduced a verse from Hugo's drama, which he excised later when the story was included in the Nouvelles. As for King Candaules, it is later in date, appearing in la Presse from October 1 to 5 in the year 1844, and being subsequently included in the same volume as the other two tales here given. It is enthusiastically lauded by Victor Hugo in a letter to the author, dated October 4, 1844, and reproduced by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul in his admirable Histoire des œuvres de Théophile Gautier, to which the editor is indebted for the bibliographical details of Gautier's works.

INTRODUCTION

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

CHICAGO, ILL.

PRINTED IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED

Fortunio

F O R T U N I O

I

GEORGE was entertaining his friends at supper. Not all of them, for they numbered two or three thousand, but a few of the lions and tigers of his private menagerie.

His suppers were so famous for their brilliancy, elegance, and delicate sensuality, that it was considered a piece of luck to be invited to them; but it was difficult to obtain the favour, and few could boast of having their names habitually inscribed on the list of fortunate ones. A man had to be a very high liver indeed, tried by fire and water, before he could be admitted into the sanctuary.

As for the women, the conditions were still harder, — the most perfect beauty, the most refined corruption, and not more than twenty years of age. Hence it will be readily supposed that there were not many women at George's supper, although the second condition is apparently easy enough to fulfil. There were four that evening, four superb, thorough-bred creatures, half angels, half devils, with hearts of steel in breasts of marble, miniature Cleopatras and Imperias, the most delightful monsters imaginable.

FORTUNIO

Although there was every possible reason why the supper should be exceedingly gay, it was, on the contrary, rather dull. Pleasant fellows, excellent cookery, very old wines, very young women, candles enough to deaden the noonday light,—all the elements which usually go to make up human enjoyment were combined in proportions rarely met with, yet a shadow of dulness had fallen upon every brow; George himself found it difficult to conceal a feeling of disappointment and annoyance which his guests seemed to share.

The party had sat down to table on leaving the Bouffes, that is, at about midnight. A magnificent clock by Boulle, placed upon a pedestal inlaid with tortoise-shell, was about to strike one o'clock, and yet the guests had only just taken their seats. An empty chair denoted that some one had failed to come, and so the supper had begun with the unpleasant sensation of disappointed expectation, and dishes which were no longer at their best; for it is with cookery as with love, there is a moment that never recurs, and which it is extremely difficult to seize upon. The absentee must unquestionably have been very highly thought of by the company, for George, who was a gourmand after the manner of Apicius, would not have waited fifteen minutes for a couple of princes.

FORTUNIO

Musidora, the most piquant of the four deities, uttered a soft sigh like the cooing of a sick dove, which meant, "I am going to spend a gloomy evening and to be horribly bored. The party has started wrong, and these young fellows look like undertakers."

"Heaven blast me!" said George, breaking between his fingers a very costly Venetian glass, bell-shaped on a spiral stem rayed with milky lines. The broken glass scattered over the cloth, in lieu of dew, a few drops of old Rhine wine more precious than Orient pearls; "it is one o'clock and that confounded Fortunio is not here!"

The handsome girl was seated by the empty place intended for Fortunio, so was completely alone on that side. The seat had been reserved for Fortunio as a place of honour, for Musidora belonged to the highest ranks of the aristocracy of beauty, and she certainly lacked only a sceptre to be a queen. Possibly she might have obtained it in a poetic age, or in those fabulous days when kings married shepherdesses. It is not quite certain, either, that Musidora would have accepted a constitutional monarch. She appeared not to be enjoying herself; she had even yawned once or twice quite openly. She cared for no one among the guests, and her self-love not being interested, she remained cold and gloomy as if she had been alone.

FORTUNIO

Until Fortunio turns up, let us cast a glance over the room and the guests. The room itself has a rich and splendid air. The walls are wainscotted in oak set off by dull gold arabesques. A richly carved cornice, supported by children and monsters, runs around the room. The ceiling is formed of cross beams covered with ornaments and carvings, and upon the golden background of the compartments have been painted female faces in the Gothic taste, but with more freedom and grace of manner. Between the windows are placed sideboards and tables in antique breccia supported by silver dolphins with gilded eyes and fins, whose twisted tails form capricious volutes. The sideboards are laden with silver plate engraved with coats of arms, and flagons of strange shapes holding curious liqueurs. Full, thick curtains of orange-red velvet hang before the stained-glass windows, which are provided with triple shutters to prevent any noise from outside being heard within, or from within being heard outside. A great mantelpiece of carved wood fills up the end of the room. Two caryatids with jutting breasts and swelling hips, their long hair falling in waves, two living figures worthy of Jean Goujon or Germain Pilon, support on their shoulders a transverse shelf delicately carved and covered with foliage, the finish of which is admirable. Above, a bevelled Venetian mirror, very narrow and placed horizontally, sparkles within a magnificent frame. A perfect forest is flaming within the vast chimney, lined with white marble, with two great bronze dragons, their wings provided with claws, for andirons. Three chandeliers of rock crystal covered with wax tapers hang from the ceiling like bunches of a miraculous vine. Twelve candelabra in gilt bronze, in the form of slaves' arms, spring from the wainscoting, each holding in its fist a bouquet of strange flowers whence white tapers issue like lighted pistils; to cap this splendour, and by way of ornaments above the doors, four fabulously beautiful Titians with all their glow of passion, all their wealth of warm golden colour, Venuses and mistresses of princes, proudly enthroned in their divine nudity in the red shadow of curtains, smiling with the self-satisfaction of women who are sure of being eternally beautiful.

FORTUNIO

FORTUNIO

Count George prized these paintings highly, and he would have given away twenty-five dining-rooms such as the one I have just described rather than one of his pictures. In poverty, if poverty could have come to him, he would have pawned his father's portrait and his mother's ring, before consenting to sell his beloved Titians. It was the one thing which he possessed of which he was proud.

In the centre of this great room, imagine a large table covered with a damask tablecloth with Count George's coat of arms woven in, with the coronet and motto of his house. A chased centre-piece, representing tiger and crocodile hunts with Indians riding on elephants, plates of Japan or old Sèvres china, glasses of all shapes, silver-gilt knives, and all that is necessary for drinking and eating delicately and long. Around the table four lost angels, Musidora, Arabella, Phœbe, and Cynthia, charming girls, trained in fatherly fashion by the great George himself and surnamed incomparable. Between them six young men, not one of whom was old, contrary to custom, and whose smooth and restful faces expressed the indolent security and the patrician self-possession of people who are the happy possessors of two or three hundred thousand a year and the greatest names in France.

FORTUNIO

George, as master of the house, is lying back in a great arm-chair of Cordova leather, the others are on smaller chairs of the shape now called Mazarin, made of ebony and upholstered with cherry and white silk damask of exquisite rarity.

The company is served by little naked negroes with plum-coloured trunk hose, necklaces of glass beads and golden armlets and anklets such as are seen in the paintings of Paolo Veronese. These little negroes move around the table with monkey-like agility and help the guests to the costliest wines of France, Hungary, Spain, and Italy, contained, not in ignoble bottles, but in beautiful Florentine vases of silver-gilt admirably chased; yet, in spite of their quickness, they scarcely manage to serve every one rapidly enough.

Over all this regal elegance and luxury, over the crystals, bronzes, gilding, a flood of light so brilliant that the least detail is illumined and flames strangely; a torrent of silver light which leaves no place in shadow save underneath the table, a dazzling atmosphere rayed by iris and prismatic beams which might dull less glorious eyes and diamonds than those of the incomparable Musidora, Arabella, Phœbe, and Cynthia.

FORTUNIO

On George's right, next to Fortunio's empty chair, is seated Musidora, the beauty with the sea-green eyes. She is at most eighteen years of age. Never has imagination dreamed of a more suave and chaste ideal. She might be mistaken for a living vignette from Thomas Moore's "Loves of the Angels," so limpid and diaphanous is she, and she appears rather to illumine than to be illumined herself. Her hair, so fair that it melts into the transparent tones of her skin, falls upon her shoulders in lustrous curls. A simple band of pearls, something between a frontlet and a tiara, keeps the two golden waves which fall on either side of her brow from scattering and meeting. Her hair is so fine and silky that the least breath lifts it and makes it wave. A dress of a very pale green colour figured with silver sets off the ideal whiteness of her bosom and her bare arms, round which twist two bracelets in the form of emerald serpents with diamond eyes, painfully realistic. These form her sole ornaments. Her pale face, which exhibits inexpressible youth in its heyday, is of the highest type of English beauty. A light down, like the bloom of a fruit, softens its delicate contours, and the flesh is so delicate that the light penetrates and illumines it within. That divinely pale oval face, with the two masses of fair hair, the eyes moist with vaporous languor, and the child-like mouth with its moist lustre, has an air of modest melancholy and plaintive resignation very remarkable on such an occasion. To look at Musidora, one would think she was a statue of Modesty placed by chance in a house of ill-fame.

FORTUNIO

But with a little care one notes certain less angelic glances, and at the corner of the tender rosy mouth shows now and then the tip of the serpent's tongue; yellow gleams irradiate the limpid eyes like golden veins in antique marble, and impart to the glance a soft cruelty characteristic of the courtesan and the kitten. At times the brows are feverishly agitated by deep, repressed ardour, and the eyes are filled with moist light as if a tear spread without overflowing.

The lovely girl sits with one arm hanging down, the other outstretched on the table, her lips half-parted, her full glass before her, her glance wandering around. She is borne down by that immeasurable weariness known to those only who have very early gone to excess in everything, and as far as Musidora is concerned, there is no novelty left save in virtue.

FORTUNIO

“Come, Musidora,” said George, “you are not drinking.” And taking the glass which she had not yet touched, he put it to her lips, and pressing it against her teeth, he poured the liquor drop by drop into her mouth. Musidora allowed him to do so with the utmost indifference.

“Do not torment her, George,” said Phœbe, half rising; “when she is in one of her sad fits you cannot get a word out of her.”

“By Jove!” replied George, putting down the glass; “If she will neither drink nor speak, I shall kiss her, so that she shall not be wholly unsociable.”

Musidora turned her head away so quickly that George’s lips merely touched her earring.

“Oh,” said George, “Musidora is becoming monstrously virtuous. Soon she will allow no one to kiss her but her lover,—and yet I had taught her the very best of principles. Musidora virtuous and Fortunio absent! that makes a pretty poor supper.”

Since the much wished-for Fortunio has not yet arrived, and I cannot begin my story without him, I shall ask the reader’s permission to sketch the portraits of Musidora's companions, much in the way in which one hands a book of engravings or of sketches to a person who has to wait. Fortunio, who shall, if you please, be the hero of this tale, is a young man usually very punctual, and some important reason must have delayed him and kept him at home.

FORTUNIO

Phœbe resembles Apollo's sister, save as regards chastity, and that is why she has assumed the name, which strikes her as both a madrigal and a piece of irony. She is of tall, willowy stature, and in her port has something of the warlike pride of the huntress of antiquity. Her delicate nose, with its rosy, sensual nostrils runs into her brow almost without a change. Her long, slender eyebrows, her narrow eyelids, her round, well-shaped mouth, her slightly curved chin make her closely resemble a Greek medal. She wears a costume piquant in its originality: a dress of silver brocade cut in the shape of a tunic and held on the shoulders by large cameos, silk stockings of the utmost fineness flushed with the rosiness of the flesh, and shoes of white satin, which with their crossed ties closely imitate cothurns. A crescent of diamonds fixed in her hair as black as night and a necklace of stars complete her costume.

FORTUNIO

Phœbe is Musidora's dearest friend, or rather her dearest foe.

Cynthia, enthroned at one end of the table between two handsome young fellows, one of whom is her ex-lover and the other her coming lover, is a regular, serious Roman beauty. She has nothing of the sprightly grace and the ever evident coquetry of Parisian women. She is beautiful, she knows it, and rests tranquil in the consciousness of her all-powerful charms, like a warrior who has never been defeated. She breathes slowly and regularly, much like a sleeping child; her gestures are simple and quiet, her movements few and rhythmical. At this moment she is leaning her chin upon the back of her wondrously shapely white hand, her little finger capriciously turned up, and the turn of her wrist and the pose of her arm recalling the fine, mannered poses admired in the paintings of the old masters. The black hair with blue reflections, separated in simple bandeaux, shows the little white ears which have never been pierced and stand out a little from the head like those of Greek statues. Warm brown tones soften the transition between the deep black of her hair and the rich pallor of her brow. Some light hairs on the temples diminish the stiffness of her clearly arched brows, and golden tones which increase in intensity as they ascend towards the back of the neck, gild it harmoniously and show off richly in the supple, firm flesh the three lovely folds of Venus' necklace. Her firm, mat shoulders look like the marble which Canova washed with water saturated with oxide of iron to soften its dazzling crudity and to remove the shine of the polish. Cleomenes' chisel never produced anything more perfect, and the most exquisite contours caressed by art are as nothing by the side of this magnificent reality.

FORTUNIO

When she wants to look to one side, she does so without turning her head, by turning her eyes alone, so that the blue crystal, brightened by a broader glance, is illumined with unctuous brilliancy indescribable in its effect. Then, when she has seen, she brings her dark eyes slowly back to their place, without interfering with the immobility of her marble mask.

In the pride of her beauty, Cynthia rejects all dress as an unworthy artifice. She has but two gowns, one of black velvet, the other of white watered silk. She never wears collars or earrings, not even a finger-ring. What ring, what collar, could possibly be worth as much as the spot they would cover. One day she replied with Cornelian pride to a woman who had asked to see her dresses and gems, and who, astonished at this excessive simplicity, inquired how she dressed on gala days and ceremonies: "I take off my gown and take out my comb."

FORTUNIO

That evening she was in demi-toilette, wearing her black velvet dress next to the skin without a chemise or a corset.

As for Arabella, I scarce know what to say of her, save that she was a charming woman. Supreme gracefulness marked her every motion. Her gestures were so soft, so harmonious, that they were rhythmic and musical. She was a Parisian of Parisians. She could not be called beautiful exactly, and yet there was about her such an exciting zest, so highly spiced with airs and graces and manners peculiar to herself, that her lovers themselves would have maintained that there was no woman on earth so perfect in beauty. Her somewhat capricious nose, eyes not very large but sparkling with wit, a slightly sensual mouth, pale rosy cheeks framed in by silky brown hair, composed the most adorably saucy face imaginable. For the rest, she had small feet, slender hands, a well shaped figure, neat, well turned ankles and wrists, — every mark of being thorough-bred. I will spare you the description of her dress. You must be satisfied with knowing that she was dressed in the fashion of to-morrow.

FORTUNIO

“Come! there is no doubt that Fortunio is playing us false,” cried the host, swallowing a deep draught of Constantia wine. “I have a great mind, when I next meet him, to propose that we should cut each others’ throats.”

“I am of your opinion,” said Arabella, “for it is not easy to meet my lord Fortunio. Chance is the only one clever enough to do so. I wanted to meet him,—not to cut his throat, far from it; but I could not find him, though I looked for him in every place where he might be, next in every place where he might not be. I went to the Bois de Boulogne, to the Bouffes, to the Opera, yes, even to church! and no more met Fortunio than if he had never lived. Fortunio is not a man, he is a dream.”

“What was it that you were in such a hurry to ask of him?” said Musidora, with a lazy glance at Arabella.

“The genuine slippers of a Chinese princess, as he told me one morning when he was somewhat tipsy, and which he promised to give me after he had kissed my foot, because I was the only woman in France who could wear them."

FORTUNIO

"Why don't you go to his residence?" said Alfred, Cynthia's expectant lover.

"To his residence! That is easy to say, but difficult to do."

"Yes, he must be out a good deal. He is a man of many distractions," added the ex-lover.

"You do not understand me. To go to his residence, first you must know where it is."

"Yet he has got to live somewhere, unless he roosts; which is of course possible," said George. "Does any one of you adorable princesses know by any chance on what branch of a miraculous tree that fine bird has built its nest?"

"If I knew it, Messer Giorgio, I should not be here, I swear to you, and you may believe me," said the silent Roman.

"Nonsense!" said Alfred, "who wants a residence? Ladies nowadays offer hospitality so lavishly."

"Which of you, then, ladies, serves as a residence for Fortunio?"

"You are talking nonsense," replied George gravely. "Where would he put his clothes and his boots? A man must always have a house to put his boots in. Besides, we had supper with Fortunio not long ago, and you were there, unless I am mistaken."

FORTUNIO

"So I was," said Alfred; "I had forgotten."

"I was there also," said Arabella. "For the matter of that, his supper was a good deal better than yours, George, although you pique yourself on being an adept in such matters. But it proves nothing, except that Fortunio is the most mysterious of mortals."

"There is nothing mysterious in entertaining twenty people at supper."

"Certainly not, but here is where the mystery lies, I had myself driven to the mansion where Fortunio received us, and no one seemed to know what I was talking about. Fortunio was perfectly unknown there. I set on foot inquiries which at first were fruitless, but at last I managed to find out that a young man whose name was not known, but who was exceedingly like him, had purchased the mansion for two hundred thousand francs, which he paid in bank notes, and that as soon as the bargain was struck an army of upholsterers and workmen of all sorts invaded the house and with magical speed placed it in the condition you saw it in. Numerous servants in full livery, a chef, accompanied by a host of aids and kitchen servants bearing in great covered baskets provisions enough for an army, had arrived no one knows whence the very night of the supper. The next morning everything disappeared, the servants went away just as they had come, and Fortunio walked out not to return. There was left in the mansion only the old janitor to open the windows from time to time and air the rooms."

FORTUNIO

"If Arabella had drunk water only during the meal, I might perhaps believe what she is telling," broke in Phœbe, "but her story strikes me as being as crazy and disordered as the globules of champagne which rise to the surface of my glass. She takes us for children, and tells us fairy tales with deplorable seriousness."

"Indeed, you lunatic Phœbe, is that your opinion?" cried Arabella, with the dry, sharp tone which women alone know how to take among themselves. "Yet my tale is a much truer story than many another."

"Just let Phœbe talk, and go on," interrupted Musidora, whose curiosity was at last stirred.

"I tried every means,—that is to say, I tried the only means with which one may corrupt somebody or something, to corrupt the virtuous dragon of the enchanted castle. I gave him a great deal of money, but the conscientious rascal, who perhaps was afraid that I should take my money back, could not tell me anything simply because he knew nothing, which is an excellent reason for discretion. For the rest, the worthy man, very sorry at not having any secrets to betray, kindly offered to show me the entire house on the chance that I might find something which would enlighten me. I accepted, and preceded by the old fellow, who opened the most secret places, I visited every part with extreme care. I saw nothing which could enlighten my ignorance ; there was not a scrap of paper, not a word, not a number. I went to the dealer who had sold the furniture, and who is one of the most celebrated in Paris. He had not seen Fortunio. It was a middle-aged man, looking like a steward and with the ways of a usurer, who had made every purchase. He did not know him at all otherwise. We had all been the dupes of a hallucination, and we had only thought we had supped with Fortunio."

F O R T U N I O

"This is very strange — very strange — excessively strange," murmured the elegant Alfred, who for quite a time had not needed a mirror to see double. "Ha, ha ! his creditors must be nicely sold."

FORTUNIO

“Nonsense ! he has removed somewhere else or gone to the country ; there is nothing mysterious in all that,” said George.

“What is Fortunio ? ” said Phœbe.

“Why, Fortunio is Fortunio,” broke in Alfred.
“What does it matter to you ? ”

“He is a worthy gentleman, the most genuine marquis in the world. My father knew his very well indeed. His coat of arms would adorn any carriage,” added George reflectively.

“He is very handsome,” said Cynthia, “as handsome as Guido’s Saint Michael in Rome with which I was in love when I was a child.”

“No one has finer manners, and besides he is as witty as Mercutio,” continued Arabella.

“He is said to be enormously rich, richer than all the Rothschilds together, and as generous as the magnifico in La Fontaine’s tale,” put in Phœbe.

“Then who is the mistress of that happy personage, who seems to have had a fairy godmother ? ” said Musidora.

“No one knows, for to all these virtues Fortunio joins absolute reserve ; but certainly it is not one of you, for whichever it was would have shouted it on the housetops," answered George. "It shall be you if you like — or if you are able, for Fortunio appears to be very thoroughly protected against the darts of love, and the glances of your cat's eyes, sharp and burning though they are, do not appear to me likely to find the point of his armour."

FORTUNIO

"A young English peer with six hundred thousand a year blew out his brains on my account," said Musidora disdainfully.

"Yes, but you may jump over a bridge with your handsomest dress and a brand-new bonnet, before you get Fortunio."

"He is a devil, then, your Fortunio? Never mind; I wager I will make him madly in love with me before six weeks are past."

"If he were only a devil, it would not be so difficult, and you could easily manage to do what you propose. To deceive the devil is child's play for a woman."

"Then he is an angel?"

"Not an angel, either. But you shall judge for yourself, for the gates of the mansion have just been thrown open, and I hear the sound of a carriage in the court. It must be he. I will wager my dapple-gray horses against one of your curl-papers, that you will not find a spot as big as a mouse-hole by which you can penetrate into Fortunio's heart."

FORTUNIO

"In that case, I shall drive to Longchamp in a carriage and four," said the girl, joyfully clapping her hands.

"Mr. Fortunio!" called in a shrill voice, which for a moment overcame the buzz of conversation and the clinking of glasses, a tall mulatto in a quaint costume.

All heads were suddenly turned in that direction; the meal was suspended.

Fortunio walked firmly and quickly towards George's arm-chair and shook hands with him.

"Ah, good morning, Fortunio! Why the devil are you so late?"

"You must pardon me, ladies; I have just come from Venice, where I had been invited to a very brilliant masked ball at the Princess Fiamma's. I forgot to tell George when he met me at the Opera and asked me to come to his entertainment. I have scarcely had time to change my clothes."

"Oh! If you go to balls in Venice, I have nothing more to say, but I rather think, Fortunio, that I saw you on the Boulevard de Gand less than a week ago."

FORTUNIO

You are lying like an epitaph or an official newspaper, my young friend."

"Quite right; I was on the Boulevard de Gand with Marcilly. There is nothing surprising in that."

"Oh! nothing, unless you own Faust's travelling-cloak, or have found a means to steer balloons or to ride on eagles; otherwise that ubiquity of yours appears rather improbable to me."

"Nonsense!" said Fortunio, chinking the money in his purse with a careless gesture, "if you ride this kind of thing you can get on much faster than if you had a hippogriff between your legs. Now I should much like to have a drink. My tongue is dried up for want of liquor. Mercury, bring me the Hercules cup!"

The Hercules cup was a great carved vase as large as the brazen sea supported by twelve oxen, spoken of in the Bible, and which the greatest toppers never lifted save with some dismay.

"Mercury, pour into that thimble a drop of any kind of liquor, for thirst stifles me as if it were a neck-tie drawn too tight."

Mercury poured from on high, like the pages in Terburg's paintings, the contents of an antique urn magnificently chased, the handles of which were formed of two Cupids, trying to embrace each other. Young Fortunio seized the heavy cup with a firm hand and emptied it at a draught. This splendid deed won him universal admiration.

FORTUNIO

“Oh, Mercury! Is there not some of this cheap wine left in your master’s cellar? I should like to have another cup of it.”

Mercury, astounded, hesitated a second, glancing to George to know if he should obey, but George’s eyes, in a mist of intoxication, did not express anything.

“Well, you brute! Must I repeat things twice? If I were your master, I would have you skinned alive and hung up by the feet until I could do better for you.”

Mercury hastened to take another vase from another sideboard, overset it above the cup, then withdrew with a timid air, and stood at a distance on one foot, looking like a heron in a marsh, awaiting the result with a sort of respectful anxiety.

Worthy Fortunio drained the vast cup with a facility which gave proof of long and patient study as to the best way of imbibing lush, as Master Alcofribas Nasier would say.

“Now, gentlemen, I am all ready. I have made up for lost time, and we can sup quietly. Perhaps you thought I came late for fear of having to drink, and entertained the most awful suspicions about my manners. Now you must surely consider me as innocent as a three months' lamb or a boarding-school girl going to her first communion."

FORTUNIO

"Oh, yes," said Alfred, "you are as innocent as a robber led to the gibbet."

The suggestion of Fortunio to sup quietly was absurd, for certainly nothing was more impossible. Jupiter might have come through the ceiling with his eagle and his thunderbolts, and no one would have paid any attention to him.

Musidora was about the only one who appeared to have kept her senses. Fortunio's presence had aroused her from her torpor; she was as wide awake as an adder that has long been teased with a straw. Her green eyes sparkled strangely, her nostrils swelled, the malicious corners of her mouth were drawn up, she no longer leaned against the cushion in her arm-chair, she sat upright like a horseman standing in his stirrups about to strike and making sure of his blow. George's dapple-gray horses were trotting and prancing in her mind, and she saw herself already lying back on the cushions of the carriage, raising the fashionable dust of the Bois de Boulogne with her whirling wheels.

FORTUNIO

Besides, Fortunio alone took her fancy quite as much as George's four horses, and the equipage was now secondary in importance to the perilous conquest which she was attempting. She sought within her arsenal for the most murderous glance, the most amorously victorious smile to address to him and pierce his heart. Until the moment came for a deadly blow she kept watching Fortunio with deep attention concealed under an appearance of trifling. She observed his every motion, she surrounded him with lines of circumvallation, and tried to enclose him within a network of coquetry. For Fortunio was the living type of the virile ideal dreamed of by women, and which men unfortunately realise so rarely, preferring, as they do, to abuse the permission which they have of being ugly.

Fortunio seems to be not more than twenty-four years of age. He is of middle stature, well set-up, thorough-bred, and vigorous-looking, with a gentle, resolute look, broad shoulders, delicate hands and feet, a mixture of grace and strength irresistibly effective. His movements are as velvety as those of a young jaguar, and under their nonchalant slowness, prodigious vivacity and quickness make themselves felt. His head is of the purest type of Southern beauty, rather Spanish than French, rather Arab than Spanish in character. No artist could draw a more perfect oval than that of his face. His well-shaped nose, slightly aquiline and clean cut, relieves the feminine purity of the other features and gives him something of a proud look. Velvety black eyebrows, turning bluish at the ends, show clean above his long eyelids, which look as if coloured with kohl, after the Oriental fashion. Through a singular chance the pupils of his brilliant eyes are of a celestial blue as brilliant as the azure of a mountain tarn; imperceptible brown lines ring them and set off their diamond-like brilliancy. His mouth has the vivid, moist rosininess becoming very rare indeed, which is a sign of richness of blood. The somewhat thick lower lip is full of voluptuous ardour; the upper, finer, narrower, somewhat drawn in at the ends with an expression of humorous disdain tempered by the kindness of the rest of the face, denotes resolution and great power of will. A moustache that does not seem to have been often cut, shadows the angles of the mouth with soft, silky hair. The delicately rounded chin, with a dimple in the centre, runs by a powerful line into an athletic neck,—the neck of a young bull that has never known the yoke. The brow, though not as high and broad as that of a fashionable poet, is nevertheless handsome and broad; the temples are smooth, and the parts over which the hair usually falls have a satin-like sheen. The tone of the brow is fairer than that of the face, tanned by a sun more brilliant than ours with a warm, golden tone, under which show rosy and bluish tints whose bloom revives the somewhat swart dryness of the rich, warm tone beloved of artists. Hair as black as a crow's lustrous wing, long, and slightly curled, falls around the pale face in happy disorder. The ear is small and colourless, and seems to have been pierced.

FORTUNIO

FORTUNIO

So far as the hideous modern costume enables one to judge, his frame is admirably proportioned; his limbs round and vigorous, muscles of steel covered with a velvety skin, something like the Indian Bacchus in the Museum of Antiquities, which in its harmonious perfection rivals the Venus of Milo herself, for there is nothing on earth so beautiful as grace united to strength. Under the dazzling whiteness of his shirt front one feels there is a broad, powerful chest, solid and polished like marble, on which it must be delightful for a woman to rest her head. Arms modelled as beautifully as those of Antinoüs, ending in hands inimitable in their perfection, can be guessed at through the close-fitting sleeve.

FORTUNIO

As for the rest of the costume, I shall not describe it, for the description of a modern sack coat and pair of trousers would make bolder men than I draw back with horror. But you can imagine what it is by recalling the masterpieces of the best tailors in Paris, which you have admired on some dandy at a concert, at the promenade, or elsewhere; then you must mentally add a divine elegance, a certain aristocratic and nonchalant carelessness, a modesty full of assurance and self-possession, a careless grace, manners which you have never certainly seen in any dandy: also, on the first finger of the left hand a huge diamond fine enough to rival the Regent and the Sancy diamonds, casting to right and left a blaze of light.

Musidora was a prey to the most violent emotion, although apparently she was quite at her ease. Until then she had been kept from loving by a delicate instinct, a deep feeling for beauty; amid her mad courtesan's life she had remained in perfect ignorance of passion. Her senses, excited too early, were dulled, and all the intrigues she began or broke off so easily were dictated by interest or mere fancy. As is the case with all women who have known many men, the sex inspired her with deep disgust. Dainty Musidora thought all men thoroughly despicable, and also exceedingly ugly. Their exterior did not please her any more than their minds. Insignificant or deformed, earthy or apoplectic, with bilious or blotched faces, blue when shaved, marked with deep wrinkles, rough wild hair, muscular, hairy arms did not charm her. The excessive delicacy of her temperament made her feel these defects much more keenly; a man who was but a man to robust Cynthia seemed a wild boar to her. Although Musidora was eighteen, she was not really a woman, she was not even a girl, she was a child, utterly corrupt, it is true, and concealing within her frail form hyperdiabolical wickedness. With her candid air, she would have duped cardinals and tricked Talleyrand. She therefore had remarkable advantages over her rivals, for her well-known indifference and coldness were a sort of virginity which any one would have been glad to take from her. She had the art of creating obstacles and irritating desire by erecting a barrier against it. She was less fortunate this time, however, in her attempts at seduction. In spite of her kitten-like airs and her pretty manners, Fortunio paid her only just as much attention as a well-bred man does to any woman sitting near him; that is, the meaningless semi-familiar attentions which one indulges in with a pretty woman.

FORTUNIO

FOR T U N I O

Musidora did her best to draw him into more tender conversation and some of those rather warmly gallant phrases which may be taken at a pinch for a confession, or even for a plain declaration of love; but Fortunio, like a sly fish, wisely played around the net, and did not enter it. He replied evasively to Musidora's insinuating questions, and at the very moment when she thought she had him, would break away with an unexpected joke. She tried every possible plan, made false confidences to him in order to obtain real ones, questioned him about his travels, his life, and his tastes. Fortunio drank, ate, laughed, said yes or no, and slipped between her fingers more fluid and more difficult to retain than quicksilver.

"Why, George!" said Musidora, bending towards him, "this man is like a porcupine. I do not know how to take him."

FORTUNIO

“Take care not to spit your heart on one of his quills, my queenlet,” replied George.

“What life has he led? what is he made of?” said Musidora, troubled.

“The devil knows,” replied George, with a shrug of the shoulders full of meaning.

“Fortunio! Fortunio!” cried Arabella, rising at the other end of the table; “When am I going to get your Chinese princess’s slippers?”

“They are in your room, fair lady, carefully placed on the tiger skin which you use for a carpet.”

“Nonsense, Fortunio! you have never entered my bedroom, and last night there were certainly no slippers at the foot of my bed.”

“Probably you did not look carefully. I assure you they are there,” said Fortunio, imbibing a deep draught of wine.

Arabella smiled incredulously.

“Is it true,” said Musidora, with childish coquetry, “that these slippers were given to you by a Chinese princess?”

“I think so,” replied Fortunio. “She was called Yu Tsu. A lovely girl! She had a silver ring in her nostrils and her brow was covered with gold plates. I wrote madrigals for her, in which I told her that she had a jade-like skin and eyes like willow leaves."

FORTUNIO

"Was she prettier than I?" broke in Musidora, looking towards Fortunio as if to make the comparison easier.

"It depends. She had small wrinkled eyes turned up at the corners, a flat nose, and red teeth."

"Oh, the monster! she must have been hideous."

"Not at all; she passed for an incomparable beauty. All the mandarins were madly in love with her."

"And were you?" said Musidora, piqued.

"She adored me, and I let her do so."

"Mr. Fortunio, either you are amazingly conceited or else you are making fun of us. You bought the slippers in some curiosity shop."

"I swear to you I did not. You ask questions and I answer them. As for the slippers, they were not bought. Besides, who has not gone to China some time or another? Won't you have some of this sherry? It is excellent."

"Pass me your glass," said Musidora with a graceful smile. Fortunio held it out to her without being astonished at so signal a favour. Musidora carried to her lips the side which Fortunio's mouth had touched.

FORTUNIO

When she had drunk, he filled and emptied the glass very quietly, as if a young and lovely woman had not just touched it familiarly with her pretty, rosy lips.

Musidora did not give up the game, but by a clever movement threw off her satin slipper and put her foot on Fortunio's. Her silk stocking, more tenuous than a cobweb, enabled the perfection and the ivory polish of this Cinderella-like foot to be felt in full.

"Don't you think, Fortunio, I could put on your princess's slippers?" said Musidora, her cheeks burning as she lightly pressed Fortunio's foot with her own.

"They would be too large for you," quietly replied Fortunio, and he went on drinking without further ceremony.

This might have passed for a compliment but for Fortunio's indifferent air, so Musidora did not look upon it as a favourable omen. Seeing that her efforts were in vain, she changed her plan, affected indifference,—without, however, taking away her foot,—and talked with George. Her coldness was no more successful than her coquetry had been. Fortunio spoke to her at long intervals only, as if to discharge a duty. Musidora thought she noticed that Fortunio was slightly pressing her knee, but she soon found out her mistake.

FORTUNIO

While this business was going on, I need not say that the rest of the company were drinking heavily and indulging in the most gigantic bacchanal imaginable. The fashionable Alfred called for the heads of tyrants and the abolition of the slave trade, to the great amazement of the negro waiters, astounded at such sudden philanthropy; two of the gentlemen had suddenly slipped from their chairs under the table and were snoring like priests in church; the others were warbling and shrieking something or another in most lamentable and funereal fashion, an agreeable occupation which they interrupted from time to time to relate to themselves their own successes, for no one was fit to listen.

The women, who had resisted longer, were at last being drawn into the whirlpool. Arabella was so tipsy that she forgot to be coquettish; Phæbe, her two elbows on the table, was gazing with stupid fixity at one of the figures of the centre-piece which she did not see. As for the Roman, she was wonderful in her placid peace. She was gently wagging her head and seemed to beat time to music that she alone could hear; an idle smile played upon her half-opened lips like a bird over a rose, and her long dark lashes and black eyes cast a deep shadow over her rosy cheeks. Her two hands were placed one upon the other like those of the Roman woman in Ingres' magnificent portrait, and her striking calm was in marked contrast with the general turbulence.

FORTUNIO

As for Musidora, the drop of sherry was beginning to go to her head. Her brow was pearly with a slight perspiration, fatigue overcame her in spite of herself, the little golden dust of sleep began to roll in her eyes; she dozed off like a little bird that feels warm in its downy nest. From time to time she half opened her lovely eyelids to look at Fortunio, whose splendid profile stood out superbly against the background of dazzling light. Then she closed them, seeing him all the same, for the beginnings of the dreams she indulged in were still full of Fortunio. Then she let fall her head like a flower overcharged with dew, mechanically drew over her eyes two or three curls of her beautiful fair hair as if to make a curtain of them, and fell fast asleep.

"Ah!" said George, "Musidora has tucked her head under her wing. Look what a lovely mouth she has. She could sleep in the midst of an orchestra of drums. She is very pretty, and yet I prefer my Titians. Between you and me, Fortunio, I have never loved any one but the beautiful girl who is lying above that door on her bed of red velvet. Just look at her hand, her arm, her shoulder ! What wonderful drawing, what vigour of life and colour ! ”

FORTUNIO

“ Take care, Giorgio carissimo, take care ! You worry me, you may get pleurisy if you excite yourself thus. Preserve yourself for the sake of your worthy parents, who want you to be a peer of France and a minister. You are wrong to slander nature, which has its value. You are talking of the shoulder of that painted woman ? Why, look at Cynthia yonder, who says nothing and lets her eyes wander on the ceiling, thinking perhaps of her first love in a little brick house in the Transteverine Quarter, and whose shoulders are finer than those of any Titian in Venice or Spain. Come here, Cynthia, show us your back and bosom, and prove to that fellow George that God is not as unskilful as he pretends.”

The beautiful Roman woman rose, gravely undid her dress, which slipped down to her waist, and showed a bosom wonderful in its purity of line, and shoulders and arms fit to make a god come down from heaven to kiss them.

FORTUNIO

“Put on your dress, we have seen you enough.”

The Roman woman slowly went back to her seat. As for George, he still repeated, “I prefer my Titians.”

The candles were burning low; the negroes, worn out, had fallen asleep standing leaning against the wall. The table, so splendidly set, was in the most frightful disorder, stained with wine, covered with débris; the elegant confections were falling to pieces, the marvellous dessert of fruit, pineapples and Chili strawberries, the dishes dressed with such care, all had been destroyed, upset, and wasted; the cloth looked like a battlefield. Yet some of the more obstinate among the guests were still struggling with the despair of unfortunate courage, and tried to overcome drunkenness and sleep; but they had lost their dash and vigour; they could scarcely make a noise, and were unable even to break the china and the glassware, which is the violent method used to revive a waning orgy.

George himself was turning green in a very marked manner, and had just entered that unhealthy period of intoxication when a man begins to talk of morality and to celebrate the charms of virtue. Fortunio alone, still fresh, his eye clear, his lips red, with a calm restfulness like that of a devotee about to go to communion, his mind as free as when he had come in, was playing carelessly with his silver-gilt knife, and appeared ready to begin again.

FORTUNIO

“Well!” said Fortunio, “no one drinking! That is poor hospitality. I am as dry as sand after a fortnight’s drought.”

An immense bowl of arrack punch was brought in, lighted and blazing, the pretty flames gliding over the surface like a round of will-o’-the-wisps. George filled his own glass and Fortunio’s with the blazing liquor, seized the bowl by its pedestal and threw it on the floor, saying with a gesture of ineffable contempt, “It is better to throw it away than to profane it by giving it to such brutes. Let us cook them alive, since they will not drink. We are justified in doing so, for they are only beasts.”

The blazing liquid spread over the floor, and the bluish tongues began to lick the feet of the sleepers and the edges of the tablecloth. The gleam of the improvised conflagration at once flashed through the most carefully closed eyelids, and soon everybody was up—even the worthy gentlemen who had slid down at the beginning of the storm and who would unquestionably have been cooked alive if Mercury the negro and Jupiter the mulatto had not helped them to emerge from the dark subterranean places where they were lying.

FORTUNIO

"Where is Fortunio?" asked Musidora, pushing aside her curls.

"Fortunio?" said George, "he was here just now."

"He has gone," said Jupiter, respectfully.

"Who knows when we shall see him again? Perhaps he has gone to drink with the Grand Mogul or Prester John. Queenlet, I am afraid you will be obliged to go on foot or in a hired carriage like a virtuous girl. If you come upon him, you will be mighty lucky."

"Never mind," said Musidora, drawing from her bosom a small pocket-book with gold corners; "I have got his pocket-book."

"Why, you female devil! You are a well brought-up girl! Never would ordinary parents have thought of teaching you to steal."

II

MUSIDORA did not awake until about three in the afternoon, which is a very sensible hour. She carelessly stretched out her arm towards a silk cord hanging near her bed, but her white hand fell back.

FORTUNIO

Musidora's bed was extremely plain. It in no wise resembled the beds of rich middle-class women, that look like street altars erected for Corpus Christi Day. This bed was as fresh and charming as the interior of a harebell. Curtains of Indian muslin lined with white cashmere hung in cloudy folds from a broad silver rose fixed in the ceiling and fell around an elegant bedstead of very pale citron-wood with ivory feet and inlaid work. Through the sheets of ideally fine, vaporous Holland linen, showed softly the pale rose-coloured mattresses filled with the silkiest of Thibetan wool. That precious wool, probably the real golden fleece that Jason set forth in search of on the ship Argo, seemed scarcely costly enough to Musidora for ordinary mattresses. Her devilish pride was inwardly flattered at the thought that her bed held the price of the corruption of twenty honest girls, and that two or three yards of that woven and dyed wool would make the fiercest scruples suddenly yield. A double bolster edged with English point-lace yielded softly under her little head, sunk in its fair curls scattered around her like the water from a naiad's urn. A white satin coverlet filled with the costly down which the eider plucks from its wings to warm its dear young was spread over her like a warm fall of snow, and under the folds of the stuff could be faintly seen a charming little slope formed by her half-drawn up knee.

FORTUNIO

That is how the lovely Musidora was bedded. For that single bed, Africa had given its largest elephant tusks, America its costliest wood, Mazulipatam its muslin, Cashmere its wool, Norway its down, France its skill. The whole world had been ransacked, and each corner of it had contributed its highest luxury. It is only courtesans, who have spent their childhood in eating raw apples, who can indulge in such insolently brazen luxury. Heliogabalus and Séguin did not more enjoy soiling gold and making it vile than this frail girl whose name was Musidora.

However, the girl's bed, as I have said, was none the less of the most maidenly simplicity. The rest of the furniture was just as ruinously simple. The walls and the ceiling were hung with white satin relieved with rose and silver cords. A white carpet, thick as the sward strewn with roses that seemed living, covers the rosewood floor. Doors so accurately cut in the hangings that it was difficult to see where they were, had handles and guards of beautifully cut Irish crystal. The clock was made of a block of Oriental jasper with a dial of inlaid platinum. At the bed head, by way of night light, there was placed upon an elegant table a small red clay Etruscan lamp of the most correct form, with charming drawings of winged chimeras and women at their toilet. A few chairs, the indispensable sofa, and a mosaic table, composed the rest of the furniture.

FORTUNIO

Musidora opened her little mouth as wide as she could without managing to yawn very wide. Her pearly teeth showed like dewdrops within a poppy, and most lovely they looked. Musidora's yawn was more graceful than any other woman's smile. She closed her silken eyelashes, lay on her left side, then on her right, and seeing that she could not hope to sleep again, uttered a soft, languidly modulated sigh as full of reverie and thought as a note of Beethoven. For the second time she stretched her arm towards her bell. An unseen door concealed in the wall opened partially, and through the narrow opening glided into the room a tall, well-made girl with a picturesque bandana headdress in the Creole fashion. She came on tiptoe to her mistress's bedside and awaited her orders in silence.

FORTUNIO

“Jacintha, draw back the window-shades and help me to sit up.”

Jacintha drew aside the heavy curtains. A bright, saucy ray of sunshine burst into the room like a spoiled child, accustomed to be well received everywhere on account of his gaiety.

“Oh, you wretch! Do you want to blind me and to make me darker than a bear’s nose and the hands of a tight-rope dancer?” moaned Musidora. “Put out that dreadful sun quickly. So, that is right. Now beat up my pillows.”

Jacintha took two or three, which she beat up and arranged softly behind the back of her voluptuous mistress.

“What do you wish next, madam?” said Jacintha, seeing that Musidora did not make the gesture with which she was in the habit of dismissing her.

“Tell Jack to bring me my English cat, and have my bath made ready.”

The door opened softly, and Jacintha disappeared as she had come in.

FORTUNIO

III

I BELIEVE it not out of place to devote a chapter to Musidora's cat, a charming animal, which is quite as good as the lion of Androcles, Pellisson's spider, the dog of Montargis, and other virtuous and learned animals whose memory has been preserved by grave historians.

It is a common saying, "Like dog, like master," and it might be said also, "Like cat, like mistress." Musidora's cat was white, fabulously white, whiter than the whitest of swans. Milk, alabaster, snow, whatever has served to make white comparisons since the beginning of the world, would have seemed black by its side. Of the millions of imperceptible hairs which composed its ermine fur, there was not one which did not shine like the purest silver. Imagine a great puff with a pair of eyes in it. Never did the most coquettish and mannered woman have the perfect grace and finish of movement which this adorable cat exhibited. She undulated, arched her back, turned her head, curled her tail, put out and withdrew her paw in the daintiest fashion. Musidora copied her as closely as she could, though she was far from equalling her; yet, imperfect as was the imitation, it had made Musidora one of the most graceful women in Paris, — that is, in the world, for there is nothing here below but Paris.

FORTUNIO

A little negro, dressed in black from head to foot by way of more striking contrast, is charged with the care of this discreet, white creature. He puts her to bed every evening in a cradle of sky-blue satin, and brings her to her mistress in the morning. He is also charged with feeding the cat, combing her, washing her ears, smoothing her moustaches, and putting on her collar, — a collar of genuine, fine pearls of very great price. There are virtuous mortals who will no doubt be indignant that so much luxury should be lavished upon a mere animal, and who will say that it would have been much better to spend the money on bread for the poor. To begin with, people do not give bread to the poor, they give them a sou, and not very often either, for if everybody gave a sou every day, the poor would be richer than nabobs. Then I must ask the worthy philanthropists who distribute economic soup to observe that the existence of Musidora's cat is just as useful as anything else.

First, it pleases Musidora, and prevents her slapping two or three maids a day. Secondly, the little negro, who has nothing to do but to care for this animal would otherwise be cooking in the West Indian sun, where he would be thrashed from morning to night and from night to morning; instead of which he is well fed, well clothed, and all he has to do is to show black by the side of the white creature. Thirdly, the charming cat has no greater pleasure than to use her claws upon the interior lining of her little sky-blue boudoir, so that a new one has to be provided pretty much every month, and that is enough to pay for the schooling of the two children of Musidora's upholsterer; so France will be indebted to that remarkable white cat for a barrister and a doctor. Fourthly, three little peasants are earning enough to pay for a man if they should be drawn by the conscription, by catching with lime little birds for the breakfast and dinner of the cat, that would refuse to eat them if they were not alive.

FORTUNIO

The pretty, voluptuous animal, almost as cruel as a woman who is bored, likes to hear her dinner chirping in her stomach, and there is nothing living enough for her. To my knowledge that is her one defect.

As for the collar, it was given to Musidora by a general of the Empire who stole it in Spain from a black Madonna. It was in the shape of a bracelet. It passed straight from the very white arm of the young girl to the whiter neck of the cat. I consider that a pearl collar is much more in its place on the velvety neck of a pretty cat than on the red and skinny neck of an old Englishwoman.

FORTUNIO

All this may appear a digression to some of my readers. I am entirely of their opinion, but without digressions and episodes how could one possibly write a novel or poem, and how could one read either after it is written?

IV

WHEN the negro had brought the white cat and placed her by his mistress's side on the snow-white down, Musidora, now wide awake, began to remember a certain Fortunio whom she had seen the night before at George's supper. The features of the beautiful face, made finer by sleep, now showed clearly within her memory. She saw him again, handsome, smiling, and calm in the midst of the dreadful noise, as inaccessible to intoxication as to love. She recalled the wager she had made that she would enter with drums beating and standards flying into the fortress of that impregnable heart before six weeks were out, and that she would warm her feet on the very andirons of that elegant vagabond whose real dwelling no one knew. The victoria with its four dapple-gray horses, its postilions in satin jackets, its cracking of whips, and its flash of varnish passed before her eyes like a whirlwind. She clapped her little hands with joy, so sure was she of success. "How delightful it will be," she said, laughing to herself, "to take Fortunio driving in the very carriage he will have helped me to win!" And to begin hostilities, she put her hand under the pillow and drew from it the stolen pocket-book, which she had in vain tried to open the night before.

FORTUNIO

"I shall manage it," she said, turning it over in every possible way. "Just imagine a woman feeling there is a secret behind so slight a guard, and not breaking it down. For my part, I would have undone the Gordian knot without needing a sword like that brute Alexander."

Musidora sat up, and with the swiftness of a ferret looking for a hole into which she may insert her sharp nose to reach some preserve full of milk and fresh eggs, began to look for the secret which was to give access to the mysterious pocket-book, wherein, no doubt, she would find valuable information concerning my hero. She felt with her fingers, more delicate than the antennæ of insects or the horns of a snail, every rib and every rugosity of the leather; one after another, she pressed every turquoise and every chryso-prase which studded the two outer surfaces of the pocket-book; she pressed with all her strength, until she actually bent back her frail, delicate thumb, upon the lock, to overcome the resistance of the spring. She might just as well have tried to open a strong-box banded with steel. She was so intent upon her attempt that a light perspiration began to show upon her delicate brow. It was long since she had worked so hard.

FORTUNIO

At last, despairing of opening the trusty pocket-book, she rang for Jacintha, and called for scissors with which to cut a portion of the cover, and thus manage to withdraw the letters and papers which might be within; but the leather was not even scratched by Musidora's fine English scissors. It was made of some lizard or serpent-skin tougher than bison or buffalo-skin. The imbricated scales, which Musidora had mistaken for stamped or symmetrical work, prevented any cutting of the leather.

However, Musidora had touched by chance the spot at which the pocket-book opened. The covers separated with a sharp snap like the click of a jack-in-the-box.

FORTUNIO

The young girl let fall the pocket-book on her lap, expecting to see spring from it an irritated genie as out of the magic jars of Arab tales, or an asp coiled up on its tail. Pandora never gazed in a more fearful attitude at the box of which she had raised the cover, and from which escaped in a dense smoke all the ills that afflict this earth. Yet, seeing that nothing came out, Musidora became reassured and picked up the book to examine it and ascertain what she had discovered.

A quaint, exotic, intoxicating perfume, unlike any known scents, spread through the room and acted voluptuously upon the olfactory nerves of the curious beauty. She stopped a moment to breathe in that strange aroma, then plunged her inquisitive fingers into the different parts of the pocket-book, which were made of silvery Chinese silk flushed with gold and greenish tints.

The first thing she drew from it was a large flower of curious shape, from which the colour seemed long since to have vanished. It was the Pavetta Indica, of which Dr. Rumphius speaks in his "Hortus Malabaricus." This gave no very clear information concerning my lord Fortunio.

FORTUNIO

Next, Musidora pulled out a small tress of blue hair intertwined with gold threads and having at each end a pierced golden sequin. Then a sheet of Japan paper covered with curious characters interlaced like network, on a background of silver flowers. She supposed this to be some plaintive epistle from the Princess Yu Tsu to the Lord Fortunio.

Musidora did not quite know what to make of this pocket-book so curiously filled; nevertheless, hoping to come across some more European and intelligible find, she emptied the other two pockets. All she got was a golden needle rusted and reddened at the point, and a small piece of papyrus covered with a great many characters which looked as if they might be in Oriental writing. The disappointed girl angrily threw the pocket-book into the very middle of the room.

"Alas!" said she, looking with an air of deep commiseration at her pretty fingers still marked with the useless work imposed upon them, "I shall not have the carriage, I shall not have Fortunio! — Jacintha, take me to my bath."

Jacintha threw around her mistress a great wrapper of muslin, took her up in her arms and lifted her like a sick child.

FORTUNIO

V

IF Musidora is very much put out, I am even more so, for I reckoned upon that pocket-book to give my readers — may I be forgiven this piece of vanity! — accurate information concerning my mysterious hero. I had hoped that the pocket-book would contain love letters, drafts of tragedies, novels in two volumes or more, or visiting cards at least, as would necessarily be the case with the pocket-book of any well-conditioned hero. Cruel, indeed, is my embarrassment. For since Fortunio is the hero of my own choice, it is right that we should be interested in him and wish to know whatever he does. I must speak of him often, he must rise above the other characters and get to the end of my two hundred odd pages, dead or alive. And yet never was a hero more troublesome. You expect him and he does not come; you have got hold of him and he vanishes without a word, instead of making fine speeches and long discourses in poetic prose, as he ought to do in his character of hero of a novel.

It is true that he is handsome, but between you and me, I think he is eccentric, as tricky as a monkey, full of conceit and caprice, more changeable than the moon, more variable than a chameleon. To these defects, which I can still forgive him, he adds that of refusing to speak of his own business to any one, which is unpardonable. He is satisfied with laughing, drinking, and being a well-bred man. He does not discourse of the passions, or of the metaphysics of the heart ; he does not read fashionable novels ; he tells, by way of adventures, of Malay or of Chinese intrigues only, which can in no wise harm the great ladies of the noble Faubourg. He does not roll his eyes at the moon at dessert, and never talks of any actress. In a word, he is a mediocre man who every one, I know not why, insists is witty, and whom I am very sorry to have taken for the principal character in my novel.

FORTUNIO

I have a good mind to drop him. Suppose I were to take George in his place? The latter has the abominable habit of getting tipsy morning and evening and sometimes during the course of the day, and also occasionally at night. What would you say, madam, to a hero that was always drunk and would talk for two hours at a stretch on the difference between the right and the left pinion of a partridge?

FORTUNIO

“What of Alfred?”

“He is too stupid.”

“And de Marcilly?”

“He is not stupid enough.”

So, for lack of a better, I shall keep Fortunio, and as soon as I know anything about him, I shall tell it to you. So let us, if you please, enter Musidora’s bathroom.

VI

MUSIDORA’S bathroom is octagonal in form; the walls are lined half way up with small square tiles of blue and white porcelain. Paintings in light green monochrome representing Diana and Calisto, Salmacis and Hermaphrodite, Hylas surrounded by nymphs, Leda surprised by the swan, framed in richly wrought frames with reeds and water plants carved and silvered, are placed above the doors, over which hang chintz portières with a tiny flower pattern. Shells, madrepores, and corals ranged along the cornice complete the aquatic decoration.

The windows, glazed with azure blue and pale-green glass, shed on this mysterious retreat a soft and voluptuously chastened light, so that one might believe one’s self in the very palace of an Undine or a naiad. A beautiful bath of white marble supported by gilded claws fills up one end of the room. Opposite is the couch.

FORTUNIO

Musidora has just been brought by Jacintha to the edge of the bath-tub. While two handsome girls plunge their rosy arms into the tepid, smoking water, so as to make sure that the heat is even at the head and the foot, she walks about the room in Turkish fashion on two little pattens, and complains in a dying voice of the slowness and unskilfulness of her people, with as graceful impertinence as a duchess of the proudest times. Finally she draws near the bath lined with linen of exquisite fineness, slightly lifts her small, rounded, and polished leg and dips the tip of her toe into the water.

“Jacintha, support me !” she says, as she falls back upon the shoulder of her kneeling maid, “I am fainting !”

Then, in a sharp voice, the dryness of which scarcely matches her soft and affected manner : “So you want to cook me alive, to make me as red as a lobster for a week ! I am quite sure that this evening the skin of my foot will come off with my stocking,” she adds, speaking to the two maids. "Can you never prepare a bath properly?"

FORTUNIO

The bath was cooled. Musidora then ventured to put in her other leg, knelt down, her arms crossed on her bosom like the antique statues of Modesty, and at last stretched herself out in the water like a serpent compelled to untwist. Then she had some other complaint to make: the linen was so coarse it scratched her and marked her back and loins; that was always the way, they always did it on purpose,—she did not know what would come next; in a word, all that bad temper and disappointed curiosity can suggest to a pretty, wilful woman who has never been contradicted once in her life.

The soft warmth of the bath, however, seemed to diminish this nervous irritation, and Musidora let her lovely arms float nonchalantly over the water. Sometimes she raised them and enjoyed with childish curiosity seeing the water divide on her skin and roll to the right and to the left in transparent pearls.

Jacintha entered and whispered something to Musidora. It was to say that Arabella asked to see her.

"Tell her to come in," said Musidora, raising her body so as to bring it from the bottom of the bath to the surface, in order that the glance should have to traverse only a thin layer of crystal to see the submerged perfections; for she knew that Arabella had said that she was thin, and she was not sorry to give the lie in unmistakable fashion to that statement; for Musidora, by a privilege peculiar to organizations of very strong vitality, was at once very slender and very plump.

FORTUNIO

“Well, you beauty, how are you?” said Arabella as she kissed Musidora.

“Fairly well, my health is improved. For some time past I have been putting on flesh,” and the vindictive girl drew herself up still more. The tips of her breasts and one of her knees emerged from the water. “I seem thinner, don’t I, when I am dressed?” she went on, fixing her cat-like eyes on Arabella, who could not help blushing a little.

“Yes, you are as plump as a little ortolan rolled in lard. That is a charming surprise you keep for your favoured ones. Usually one is deceived in the opposite way. But you do not know what has brought me.”

“No; do you?” said Musidora, smiling.

“First, the pleasure of seeing you.”

“That is not a sufficient reason.”

FORTUNIO

“Well, I have come to tell you of an absurd, unimaginable, mad, impossible thing which upsets all preconceived notions. If I believed in the devil, I should say it was the devil in person.”

“Have you really seen the devil, Arabella? I wish you would introduce him to me since you know him,” said Musidora, with a half-incredulous look. “I have long desired to meet him.”

“You remember the Chinese princess’s slippers that Fortunio promised me? Well, I found them, just as he said, on the tiger skin at the foot of my bed. All the doors were closed, and that to my bedroom opens only by a combination which I alone know. Is it not strange? Fortunio is a demon in black coat and white gloves. How did he manage to pass through the key-hole with these slippers?”

“Perhaps you have some secret door, the key to which has been given him by some of your former lovers,” said Musidora, with a somewhat venomous smile.

“No; that room is the one where I keep my diamonds and my jewels. It has but one door, which I carefully closed when I left to go to George’s supper. Meanwhile, here are the slippers.”

Arabella drew from her bosom two little shoes curiously embroidered with gold thread and pearls, most Chinese in design and the prettiest imaginable.

FORTUNIO

“Why, the pearls are real, and the work is the finest of Eastern work!” said Musidora, examining the slippers. “It is a much more valuable gift than you fancied. Just look at those two pearls — Cleopatra’s were neither purer nor rounder.”

“Fortunio is really Oriental in his magificence, but he is as invisible as an Eastern king; he only shows himself when he chooses. I am afraid, dear Musidora, you will lose your wager.”

“I am greatly afraid of it, too, Arabella. I pretended to go to sleep, but I profited by a moment when Fortunio, who did not mistrust me, had his attention called away, to snatch from him his pocket-book, the corner of which showed through his coat. To begin with, the accursed thing would not open, and I spent some two hours in finding the mysterious sesame which caused the springs to fly back and give up the precious secrets so carefully concealed. But as if Fortunio had guessed my intention, I found only a dried flower, a needle, and two bits of blackened paper covered with the most abominable scrawls. Is it not atrociously derisive?”

FORTUNIO

“ May I see the pocket-book ? ” said Arabella.

“ Yes, if you wish to. I threw it away angrily in my room. Jacintha, go and fetch it.”

Jacintha returned with the mysterious pocket-book.

Arabella smelled it all over, turned it, examined its every recess, but could discover nothing new. She remained thoughtful for a moment, and then, — “ Musidora,” she said, “ I have thought of something. Those papers must be written in some sort of a language. We ought to go to the Collège de France. There are professors of all sorts of languages there. We shall surely learn from these gentlemen, who are said to be so erudite, the explanation of this riddle.”

“ Jacintha ! Mary ! Annette ! Come and take me quickly out of this bath where I have been rotting for an hour. I can already feel drops of water growing out of my arms, and my hair is becoming as seaweed-like as that of a marine nymph,” said Musidora, standing up in her bath. The sparkling drops of water, racing over her body, formed, as it were, a net-work of pearls ; she was lovely in that attitude. Her skin lightly touched by the kiss of the air, her long, fair hair falling upon her back and shoulders, her face gently flushed with the humidity of the bath, she looked like a sylph rising with the first moonbeams from the heart of the flower bell where she has taken refuge during the day.

FORTUNIO

The servants hastened up, sponged off her body the last tears of the naiad, enveloped her carefully in a great cashmere wrapper over which they threw a vast Turkish shawl, put her feet into elegant slippers lined with swan's-down, and Musidora, leaning on the shoulder of her maid Jacintha, passed into her dressing-room with her friend Arabella.

There she was combed and perfumed, she put on a chemise with exquisite Valenciennes lace, she was shod, and every one of her clothes was put on her without her helping herself in the smallest degree. But when the maids had finished, she rose, stood before the mirror, and like a master who adds here and there a touch to the work carried out according to his design, by one of his pupils, she untied a ribbon, gave another form to a fold, passed her slender fingers through the masses of her hair to derange their too exact symmetry, and gave accent, life, and a poetic turn to the colourless work of her women.

Thereafter they breakfasted quickly, and Jack announced that the carriage was waiting.

FOR T U N I O

We shall not begin the next chapter, and we shall not get into the carriage, without having said how Musidora was dressed. She had on a white India muslin with close-fitting sleeves, a rice-straw hat with a bunch of small flowers ideally delicate and light, a Venetian scarf of black lace gracefully thrown over her shoulders and somewhat drawn in at the waist, setting off admirably the abundance and richness of the folds of the dress, which stretched like marble tubes down to the smallest feet in the world. Add a jet necklace with large beads, mittens of black net, and a small watch thinner than a five-franc piece, suspended by a small silken cord, and you have Musidora's dress in full, which it is at least as important to be acquainted with as the exact year of the death of the Pharaoh Amenotepeh.

VII

THE carriage stopped before a house of mean appearance in a lonely, deserted street. You know those houses of the last century which have not been touched since they were built, and which the avarice of their owners allows to fall slowly into ruins, their gray walls weather-stained and spotted here and there with broad splashes of yellow moss like the trunks of old ash-trees. The substructures are as green as a marsh in springtime, and a special flora might be made of all the herbs which grow on them. The slates on the roof have lost their colour, the wood of the doors is rotting and seems ready to fly into splinters at the least knock. False windows, formerly painted black to resemble panes, the colour of which has run from the second story to the first, show that when the house was built a very poor attempt was made to obtain symmetry. A vane cut out of tin and representing a sportsman firing at a hare, creaks at the angle of the roof and worthily crowns the sumptuous edifice.

FORTUNIO

The groom let down the steps and knocked at the door in such masterly fashion that he nearly broke it in. The janitress, terrified, put her head out of a broken window which she used both as a look-out and as a wicket. Her face was a mingling of snout, jowl, and muzzle. Her nose, of the most violent crimson, and of the shape of a carafe stopper, was studded with brilliant grog-blossoms, adorned with three or four extraordinarily long and stiff white hairs, like the bristles upon the noses of hippopotami, that gave her proboscis the look of a holy-water sprinkler. Her two cheeks, rayed with red lines and marked with yellow blotches, were not unlike two vine-leaves killed by the autumn frost. A staring wall eye showed within its socket like a candle in a cellar. A sort of tusk of doubtful ivory turned up the corner of her upper lip like a boar's tusk and gave the finishing touch to the charm of her physiognomy. The lappets of her cap, flabby and wrinkled like elephants' ears, hung down her skinny jowls and formed a suitable frame for the whole.

FORTUNIO

Musidora was very nearly frightened at the sight of this grotesque Medusa, who fixed upon her two dirty-gray, inquisitive eyes.

"Is Mr. V—— at home?" asked Arabella.

"Certainly, madam, he is; he never goes out except to his courses, poor dear man. A very learned man, — no more trouble in the house than a tame mouse. You will find him at the back of the yard, the left hand stair, second story, the door with a hare's-foot, — you cannot mistake."

Musidora and Arabella crossed the yard, holding up their skirts as if they were walking through a meadow wet with dew. The grass was growing between the paving stones as freely as in the open ground.

FORTUNIO

But, seeing that they hesitated, the horrible Cerberus left her room and advanced towards them, waddling and limping like a wounded shepherd-spider.

"This way, ladies, this way. This is the path in the centre. This is not a house like republics in which people come and go; and yet it is not more than six weeks since I hurt my hands cutting the grass. Are you relatives of Mr. V——'s?"

Musidora shook her head negatively.

"I have heard him say that he had some country relatives who were coming to Paris."

They had now reached Mr. V——'s door, and as neither Arabella nor Musidora had answered her, the viscous, sticky beast caught hold of the balustrade and let herself slide grumbling to the foot of the stair, trusting to the cleverness of Miss Césarine, the professor's housekeeper, to obtain fuller information.

Arabella pulled at the hare's-foot. The cracked, shrill tinkling of a bell was heard in the mysterious depths of the apartment, two or three doors were opened and closed in the distance, a dry cough was heard, and a sound of heavy steps drew near. For a few moments there was a noise of heavy keys and of ironwork, of bolts drawn, of padlocks opened. Then the door, slightly ajar, gave passage to the pointed, inquisitive nose of Miss Césarine, a beauty long past her prime. At the sight of the two young women her face instantly assumed a sour expression, tempered, however, by the respect inspired by the brilliant gold chain which Arabella wore around her neck.

FORTUNIO

“We wish to see Mr. V——.”

The old woman opened the door wide and showed the two beauties into an antechamber which also served as a dining-room. It was hung with jasper-green paper and adorned with framed engravings representing the four seasons, and a barometer wrapped up in gauze to preserve it from the flies. A white earthenware stove, the pipe of which was carried into the opposite wall, a walnut table, and a few straw-bottomed chairs composed the rest of the furniture. Small, round pieces of waxed cloth were placed opposite each chair to save the red colour of the tiling, and a band of carpet ran from the entrance door to the door of the other room, also for the purpose of preserving the precious layer of red ochre so carefully waxed and wiped by Césarine. The latter recommended the two young women to walk along the carpet, whereat Musidora smiled, for she was much more desirous of not soiling her shoes than of not marking the tiling.

FORTUNIO

The second room was a parlour hung with yellow, with furniture of old yellow Utrecht velvet. The worn and polished backs of the chairs testified to long and loyal service. China busts of Voltaire and Rousseau, a pair of gilt brass candlesticks bearing tapers, and a clock with a group of Time killing Love, or Love killing Time, I really do not know which, adorned the mantelpiece.

An oil painting of Mr. V——, and one of his wife, — fortunately dead, — in the full dress of 1810, made this room the finest in the apartment, and Césarine herself, overcome with so much magnificence, crossed it only with much internal respect, although for a long time she must have been familiarised with its splendour.

The duenna begged the two ladies to be kind enough to wait a few minutes while she informed her master, who was shut up in his study, buried, according to his habit, in learned researches.

He was standing before the mantelpiece in an attitude of the most intense contemplation. He held between his finger and thumb a small piece of toast, which he was crumbling up from time to time into a bowl of clear, sparkling water, where played three goldfish. The bottom of the bowl was filled with fine sand and shells. A ray of light traversed this crystalline globe, which the motions of the three fishes tinged with burning and changing rainbow-like tints. It was really a very beautiful sight, and a colourist would not have disdained to study the play of light and the brilliant reflections; but Mr. V—— paid no attention to the alternate gold, silver, and purple with which the twisting and turning of the fishes coloured the diaphanous prism in which they were enclosed.

FORTUNIO

“Césarine,” said he, with the most serious and the most solemn look, “the big red fellow is too greedy and prevents the others feeding. He will have to be put in a separate bowl.”

It was in this important occupation that Mr. V——, professor of Chinese and Manchoo, spent regularly three hours a day, carefully shut up in his study as if he were commenting on the precepts of the wisdom of the celebrated Confucius or the “Treatise on the Breeding of Silkworms.”

“It is not a case of goldfish and their quarrels,” said Césarine dryly. “There are two ladies in the drawing-room who want to see you.”

FORTUNIO

“Two ladies to see me, Césarine?” cried the learned scholar, as he put one hand to his wig and the other to his breeches which, carelessly fastened, allowed the shirt to show between the belt and the waistcoat as through a Spanish slashing. “Two young and pretty ladies? I am scarcely presentable. Césarine, get me my dressing-gown. I have no doubt they are duchesses who have read my treatise on Manchoo punctuation and have fallen in love with me.”

He slipped, trembling with haste, his thin arms into the great sleeves of his dressing-gown, and went into the drawing-room.

On seeing Arabella and Musidora, the old scholar at once pulled his wig down to his eyes and made three bows to them, trying to be as graceful as possible.

“Sir,” said Musidora, “throughout France and Europe every one speaks of your amazing erudition.”

“You are very good, madam,” said the professor, who blushed poppy-red with pleasure.

“We are told,” continued Arabella, “that there is no one so well versed as you in the knowledge of Oriental tongues or who can so easily decipher mysterious hieroglyphs, acquaintance with which is confined to the most sagacious and erudite.”

FOR T U N I O

“I may say without vanity that I know Chinese as well as any man in France. Have you read my treatise on Manchoo punctuation?”

“No,” replied Arabella.

“Have you, Miss?” said the scholar, turning towards Musidora.

“I have glanced through it,” she said, with difficulty repressing a wish to laugh. “It is a very learned piece of work which does honour to the age which has produced it.”

“So,” replied the scholar, puffed up with pride and showing off in his vanity, “you share my opinion as to the position of the tonic accent?”

“Completely,” replied Musidora; “but that is not what we have come about.”

“True,” said the scholar. “How can I serve you, ladies? I shall do anything in the world to be agreeable to such charming persons as you.”

“Well,” said Musidora, presenting to the scholar the pocket-book which she had under her mantle, “if it is not trespassing too much on your kindness and your knowledge, we should like to have a translation of these two papers.”

The scholar took the two papers which Musidora held out, and said, with an air of great wisdom, "This is genuine Japan paper, and this genuine papyrus."

FORTUNIO

Then he placed upon his venerable nose a majestic pair of spectacles, but he could not make out a word. He took no end of trouble, yet failed to read the writing.

"I am really sorry, ladies," he said, returning the pocket-book to Musidora. "That interlaced writing is absolutely undecipherable. All that I can tell you is that the characters are Chinese, and drawn by a very practised hand. You are aware that there are forty thousand signs in the Chinese alphabet, each of which corresponds to a word. Although I have worked all my life, I yet know the first twenty thousand only. It takes a native forty years to learn to read. No doubt the ideas contained in this letter are expressed in signs included in the last twenty thousand, which I have not yet learned. As for the other paper, it is Hindustani. Mr. C—— will translate that for you at sight."

Musidora and her companion withdrew very much disappointed. Their visit to Mr. C—— was fruitless also, for the very good reason that Mr. C—— had never known any other language than the Basque dialect, which he taught to an artless German, the only pupil attending his course.

FORTUNIO

Mr. V—— had nothing Chinese about him but a screen and a couple of cups; on the other hand he spoke Low Breton fluently, and succeeded admirably in breeding goldfish. These two gentlemen were, for the matter of that, two very worthy people who had had the capital idea of inventing a language in order to teach it at the expense of the government.

While driving through a square, Arabella saw Indian jugglers performing tricks upon a wretched piece of carpet. They were throwing brass balls into the air, swallowing sword blades thirty inches long, eating tow, and blowing flames out of their noses like the dragons of fable.

“Musidora,” said Arabella, “order your groom to call up one of these tanned rascals. Perhaps he knows more Hindustani than the professors in the Collège de France.”

One of the jugglers, at the call of the groom, approached the carriage, turning on his hands and feet.

“Here, you fellow,” said Arabella, “I will give you a louis if you can read this paper, which is written in Hindustani.”

FORTUNIO

“Excuse me, madam, I come from Normandy. I am a Hindoo by profession, but I cannot read any language.”

“Go to the devil!” said Musidora, throwing him five francs.

The sham Hindoo thanked her, made a magnificent somersault and joined his painted companions, while the carriage drove towards the Boulevard.

At the door of a bazaar, a young man with a golden yellow face, great eyes shining in his pale visage like monstrous black flowers, hooked nose, flat, bluish hair, — all the marks of the Asiatic race, in a word, — was seated in melancholy fashion behind a little table that bore two or three pounds of dates, half a dozen coconuts, and a pair of scales. It was impossible to see anything sadder, more evidently nostalgic, than that poor devil, who was all curled up in the pale sunshine. No doubt he was thinking of the green banks of the Hughli, of the great pagoda of Juggernaut, of the dances of the bayaderes in the baths and at the palace gates. He was lost in a vague Oriental reverie full of golden scintillations, impregnated with strange perfumes and resonant with joyous sounds; for he started like a man suddenly awakened when Musidora’s groom signed to him that the lady wished to speak to him.

FORTUNIO

He came up with his little stock in trade hung around his neck, and putting both hands to his head, made a deep bow to the two young women.

“Read me that,” said Musidora, holding out the papyrus to him.

The fruit seller took the paper which had been held out to him, and read in strange and deep accents the writing that had puzzled the two scholars. Musidora trembled with curiosity.

“Excuse me, madam,” said the merchant, wiping away a tear from his black eyes. “I am a rajah’s son. Misfortunes which it would take too long to relate have reduced me to the condition in which you see me. For six years now I have not heard or read a word of my own tongue. It is the first piece of happiness which I have had for many a day. This papyrus contains a song in three stanzas; it is sung to a popular air in my country, and here is the meaning of the verses:—

“ ‘The snow-white butterflies in flocks fly over the sea; lovely white butterflies, when shall I through the blue air take my way?’

FORTUNIO

“ ‘Know you, O fairest of the fair, my black-eyed bayadere? If their wings they had lent to me, tell me,—know you whither I would go?’ ”

“ ‘Without taking a single kiss from the roses, through the valleys and the forests I would go to your half-closed lips, flower of my soul, and there I would lie.’ ”

Musidora gave her purse to the date merchant, who kissed her hand with the most profound adoration.

“I shall return to my country. May Bramah watch over you and load you with blessings!” said the dispossessed rajah.

Musidora, after dropping Arabella at her lover’s, returned to her abode as wise as she had left it,—her brain excited by the most irritating curiosity, her heart upset by the beginning of real passion. She had no other means of finding whither Fortunio had gone. George, who seemed to know more about him than any one else, was as dumb as Harpocrates, the god of silence; and besides, he could not very well help Musidora to win her wager from him.

Fortunio! Fortunio! Do you wear on your finger the ring of Gyges which enabled him to become invisible?

FORTUNIO

VIII

THE next day a letter was brought to Musidora. It was sealed with a sort of Arabic talisman. Musidora did not recognise the writing, which was small, peculiar, and with complicated strokes and turns like foreign writing. She broke the seal and read as follows :

“ You graceful little Demon :

“The remarkable skill with which you snatched my pocket-book does the highest honour to your society talents. I am sorry, my dear angel, that there were not a few thousand-franc notes in it to compensate you for the trouble you must have had in opening it. Your curiosity cannot have been greatly satisfied, — but how the devil could I foresee that you would steal my pocket-book on that particular evening? I cannot anticipate everything. If I had, I should have filled it with love letters, confidential notes, extracts from registers, visiting cards, and other information. The only thing I beg you to be careful of is the golden needle. Its point has been dipped in the venomous juice of the euphorbia. The smallest prick with it kills with lightning-like rapidity. That needle is a weapon more terrible than a pistol or a poniard, for it never fails.

“P. S. Have the stones which adorn the cover taken off. They are of some value. They are topazes that were given me by the Rajah of Serendib. They can be made into a bracelet which will not look badly on your beautiful arm. My jeweller in ordinary is the famous B——. I beg you will not pay for the setting. I kiss your hands and feet.

FORTUNIO

“FORTUNIO.”

IX

MUSIDORA is lying on her sofa. A wrapper of pink silk gros-grain is carelessly drawn in around her waist. Through a refinement of coquetry her legs are bare, and she wears two enamelled gold anklets which have a quaint and charming effect. Her pose would suggest to a painter the subject of a lovely sketch. Her little head, with its wealth of hair, rests upon a pile of cushions, her dainty feet are stretched upon another pile of cushions almost as high as her head, so that her body describes a voluptuous curve wondrously supple and graceful. In her hand she holds Fortunio's letter, which she has been contemplating for a quarter of an hour with the greatest attention, as if the form of the letters and the arrangement of the lines could reveal to her the secret which she seeks to penetrate.

Musidora is experiencing a feeling entirely novel for her, — she has desired something and has not obtained it. It is the first time in her life that she has met with an obstacle. Her amazement is at its height. She,

FORTUNIO

Musidora, so envied, so courted, so sought after, the queen of her elegant and joyous world, has made formal advances without meeting with the least success. What an amazing revolution! For one moment the thought of Fortunio filled her with indescribable anger, extraordinary vehemence of hatred, and she was within the breadth of one of her own soft, silky hairs of becoming his mortal enemy.

Fortunio's remarkable beauty saved him,—Musidora's anger could not stand against that marvellous perfection of form. The sweet, serene lines of the noble face stilled every evil feeling in the girl's heart, and she took to loving him with unparalleled violence, the full extent of which she did not herself suspect. If curiosity had not stirred up this nascent love, as does a wind passing over a half-lighted fire, it might perhaps have died out with the last vapours of the orgy. Had it been crowned with success, satiety would soon have followed it. But obstacle and desire had made of the spark a conflagration.

Musidora now had but one thought,—to meet Fortunio and make him love her. With this mingled the beginnings of jealousy. Whose was the tress of hair? Whose hand had given that flower preserved so long? For whom were written the verses translated by the date-selling rajah?

FORTUNIO

“What am I worrying about?” said Musidora. “Fortunio has been back from India for three years.”

Then a sudden thought flashed in her mind. She rang and Jacintha came in.

“Jacintha, tear the stones out of that pocket-book and take them to the jeweller B——, from the Marquis Fortunio. Tell him to mount them as a bracelet and try to make him talk about the marquis. I shall give you the pearl-gray dress you have been coveting.”

Jacintha returned looking rather put out.

“Well?” said Musidora, sitting up.

“The jeweller says that the Marquis Fortunio often comes to his shop and brings him stones to be set; that he calls for them himself on the day named, and always pays cash; that he is an excellent lapidary and knows gems better even than he. He knows no more than that. — And shall I have the gray dress?” said Jacintha, rather troubled at the lack of success of her diplomacy.

“Yes; don’t worry me, and leave me alone.”

Jacintha withdrew. Musidora took to looking at her letter again. She enjoyed singular pleasure in looking at the capricious signs traced by Fortunio's hands. She seemed to recognise in the note written to warn her of danger, a loving anxiety disguised under a playful form, and a secret need to think of her which was yet but vaguely felt. Perhaps even the poisoned needle was but a pretext and no more.

FORTUNIO

She dwelt for a few moments on this notion, which flattered her passion, but she soon perceived that her hope was illusory and that if Fortunio had felt the least desire for her there was not the smallest necessity for him to have recourse to such a subterfuge. She had too clearly betrayed her feelings for a man such as Fortunio to be mistaken in them. He had most carefully avoided any engagement and did not appear very eager to enter upon any intrigue. But how was she to explain this coldness in a young man whose eye flashed with such brilliant, magnetic splendour, and who bore all the outward signs of the most fiery passions? There must be in some corner of his heart an ideal, a poetic love soaring far above vulgar loves; all the strength of his soul must be absorbed by a unique and deep feeling which preserved his body from the seduction of the senses, since he had not been excited by coquetries which would have made the ashes of Nestor and Priam move in their tomb, and melted the ice of Hippolytus himself.

FORTUNIO

“Ah!” said Musidora with a sigh. “He despises me. He looks upon me as impure, he does not want me.” And Musidora cast over her past life a long, sombre glance. The golden beams which rayed her green eyes seemed to writhe like serpents, her velvety eyebrows were contracted, her nostrils swelled with a fierce emotion, and she bit her lower lip with her little teeth.

“How do I know what they have told him about me? That beast, that drunken George, who is only fit to empty full bottles, — no great talent, — will not have failed to say to him, with his unbearable chuckle : ‘Ha, ha! he, he! Musidora, — oh, a delicious, an incomparable girl, the pearl of supper parties, the cynosure of all feasts, the bouquet of all balls! She is very fashionable, on my word, and you will be right to take her. It is quite the proper thing to show her at the opera and at the races. For my part, I had her for three months. Any well-bred young fellow owes that to himself. Musidora is a power in her way, a great authority on all matters of elegance. If it occurred to her to-morrow to take for a lover a country lout with thread gloves and laced boots, to-morrow the laced boots of the country lout would be considered patent leather, and many people would order similar ones.' I can hear him say it, and I am sure I have not misstated a word. Alfred, that other fool, always stuck in his cravat, his arms pinned in his sleeves, — what stupid jokes will he not have made about me, with his idiotic smile? And de Marcilly? And all of them? I wish I could trample them under foot and spit in their faces with contempt, for it is they who have made me what I am.

FORTUNIO

"Perhaps they have told Fortunio of my wager. If at least your dapple-gray horses had the sense to run away and break your neck, George! But it is quite useless for me to be angry with George. Fortunio does not need his indiscretions to guess what I am and to see my life at a glance. George is right, — I am a delightful, an incomparable girl!"

"No," said she, after a moment of silence, "I am an honest woman. I am in love."

She rose, kissed Fortunio's letter, pressed it to her heart, and denied herself to everybody.

FORTUNIO

X

THE menagerie of lions and tigers is beginning to worry about Musidora. No one knows what to think. She is not to be seen anywhere. Alfred, who is everywhere at the same time and seems to have the gift of ubiquity, has not met her once in a fortnight. The dogs are off the scent, and, baying, they travel along the promenade with their noses to the ground, looking for her track. A concert, a ball, a first performance of a play have been given, and she has not appeared at any one of them. No one has caught a glimpse of her. Gone to the country? That cannot be, for it is not yet the season. De Marcilly claims that she has some love affair in an attic with a commercial traveller; George maintains that she has had herself carried off by the Turkish ambassador; Alfred is satisfied with affirming that it is strange, very strange, excessively strange, — a stereotyped phrase which he calls to his help whenever he does not know what to think.

The truth of the matter is that for a fortnight Musidora has been invisible. Her house looks uninhabited and dead; the blinds are carefully closed; no one is seen going in or coming out; scarcely does a valet with quiet, discreet face, step in on tip-toe through a door half-opened and immediately closed. At night the windows, usually so brilliant, no longer blaze with light from the chandeliers and tapers. A pale gleam of light, dimmed by thick curtains, quivers forlorn at the corner of a pane. It is the only sign of life visible on the black face of the dwelling.

FORTUNIO

At last George, bored by the absence of his favourite, said to himself one evening, on leaving the Opera, "I must absolutely find out what has become of Musidora. I am willing to show at the Bois de Boulogne on a hired hack, to wear boots blacked with eggs, to do the most humiliating things, if I do not succeed in forcing my way in."

Whereupon he proceeded to Musidora's abode.

A porter, who had received the most formal orders not to admit any one, endeavoured to prevent George passing.

"Look here, you rascal," said George, striking him across the face with his rhinoceros-horn stick; "do you take me for Baron de B——?" And he continued on his way with a deliberate step.

He reached without difficulty the first drawing-room, where he found Jacintha, whom forthwith he kissed ; then, turning the handle of a little door which he seemed to be well acquainted with, he entered Musidora's room. He stopped for a few moments without speaking, and glanced around to see where she might be.

FORTUNIO

The small Etruscan lamp alone was lighted, and cast a beam barely sufficient to enable objects to be seen. When his eyes had become accustomed to the weak light, he perceived Musidora stretched flat on the floor, her head leaning on her hand, her two breasts crushing the thick pile of the carpet, in an attitude exactly recalling that of Correggio's Magdalen. Two locks of her uncurled hair fell to the ground and gracefully set off the melancholy expression of her face. Her brow alone was lighted. If she had not been twisting an aloe-fibre shoe on the end of one of her feet cocked in the air, she might have been mistaken for a statue.

"Musidora," said George, in a tone buffoonly paternal, "your conduct is amazing, scandalous, extraordinary ! The strangest and most ridiculous reports are current about you in society. You are compromising yourself in horrible fashion, and if you do not take care, you will lose your character."

FORTUNIO

“Ah! that is you, George, is it?” said Musidora, as if emerging from a dream.

“Yes, my infanta, it is I, your sincere and faithful friend, the sworn admirer of your charms, your cavalier, your troubadour, your Romeo.”

“George, you have managed to be more drunk even than usual. How did you do it?”

“I! Musidora, I am funereally grave. Alas! wine no longer intoxicates me. But that is not the question. I am told, Musidora, though I dare scarcely repeat it, that you are seriously in love, — in love like a shop-girl!”

“Indeed, is that what they say?” said Musidora, pushing back behind her ears the waves of hair which fell over her cheeks.

“They also say that you have turned religious, and that you intend to be a modern Magdalen — I don’t know, — endless absurd reports. But what is certain is that we do not know what to do since you took it into your head to remove your star from our heaven. Musidora, we miss you terribly. For my own part, I am bored like a patriarch, and the other day, for the sake of distraction, I was obliged to quarrel with Beppo, whom I unfortunately killed, so that I have no one left as good as I am to play chess with me. You are also the cause of my having foundered my English mare at the steeple-chase at Bièvre; for I thought I saw you in a carriage on the other side of a wall, which I made poor Belle leap, and cut her open on a piece of glass at the top. Alfred, who has finally left Cynthia to take his place among your admirers, has been reduced to such a state of brutishness by your disappearance that he actually went to the Tuileries with dirty gloves and the same stick as the night before. Such is the brief but touching account of the innumerable calamities produced by your retreat. You are too beautiful, my dear, to cloister yourself in such fashion. Beauty, like the sun, is bound to shine for everybody. There are so few beautiful women that the government ought to force every person convicted of being notoriously beautiful to show herself at least thrice a week on her balcony, so that people should not wholly lose feeling for form and elegance. It would be a great deal better than to scatter stereotyped Bibles in peasants' huts, or to found schools after the Lancastrian method;—but I do not know what the government is thinking of. Are you aware, queenlet, that since you are no longer there to harass us with the barbed arrows of your jokes, we dress like poor devils who have received an unexpected inheritance, who have been invited in the morning to a ball the same night, and who have gone to buy ready-made clothing in some Palais-Royal shop? Cannot you see for yourself that my waistcoat is too broad by a finger-breadth, and that the right end of my cravat is much longer than the left, evident signs of great perturbation of mind?"

FORTUNIO

FORTUNIO

"I am profoundly touched by your deep grief," said Musidora, with an arch smile; "indeed, I did not suppose that I was capable of causing so great a void on disappearing from the world. But I need solitude, the least noise afflicts me, everything worries and tires me."

"I understand," said George. "You would like to know if my new coat looks well from behind. I am importunate. If you were expecting somebody, I am quite sure it was not I. Never mind, I have risked being uncivil for once, and I shall not make use of the only means I have of being agreeable, — that is, going away." And as he finished his remark, he sat down quietly on the floor by Musidora's side.

"Why, you have got a pretty bracelet!" he said, lifting her arm.

"Fie!" answered Musidora with a disdainful pout.

FORTUNIO

“Are you reduced to Tartuffe’s expedient, and do you need to speak of my bracelet in order to touch my arm?”

“They are topazes of admirable water and purity,” continued George. “It is B—— who set those. He is the only one that can do that kind of work. Who is the Amadis, the Prince Galaor, the charming conqueror who has given it to you? He must be very jealous to keep you shut up and walled in as the Turkish Sultan does with his favourite odalisque.”

“It is Fortunio,” replied Musidora.

“Oh!” said George, “Fortunio! When am I to send you the carriage and horses? I am not surprised now at your disappearance. Well, you have turned your time to good account. You asked for six weeks, and it has taken you a fortnight only to penetrate a mystery which has baffled our sagacity for three years. That is very good! I shall give you a powdered coachman and two grooms into the bargain. I hope that you will now drive us in the carriage which you have so cleverly won, to the royal residence of that sly fox who has always thrown us off the scent.”

“I have not seen Fortunio since the night of the supper,” replied Musidora with a sigh, “and I know no more than you do, George, whither his caprice has taken him, — I do not even know whether he is in France. These stones came from the pocket-book which I took from him, as you know. They adorned the covers. Inside I found only a Chinese letter and a Malay song. Fortunio, finding that I had taken his pocket-book, wrote me a mocking letter in which he asked me to have a bracelet made of the topazes ; — and that is all. Since then I have had no news of him. Perhaps he has gone to join the Chinese princess.”

FORTUNIO

“ That he has not done, little one, for I have twice caught sight of him at the Bois de Boulogne : the first time in the Madrid Drive, the other, at the Maillot Gate. He was riding a devil of a black horse with a long tail and a long mane, of the fiercest look, and was going like a cannon ball. I had not yet killed Belle, and you know at what a pace she could go, but by the side of Fortunio’s hippogriff, she was, — for all that concerns the poor brute must now be put in the past tense, — a snail crawling over a stone covered with crushed sugar. Behind Fortunio galloped a little monster with a brown face, eyes bigger than his head, thick lips and flat hair, and dressed in the most eccentric fashion in the world, — a nightmare riding a whirlwind, for the whirlwind alone can go at such a pace. That is all I can tell you about Fortunio. Of course, as you say, he may be in China."

FORTUNIO

In all George's talk, Musidora had heard but one thing, — that Fortunio might be met in the Bois de Boulogne. A flash of hope lighted her green eyes, and she addressed George in more friendly fashion.

"I will give you another month," said George, kissing her hand. "Under other circumstances, I should have thrust myself on your hospitality; but we are now a girl of principles. Farewell, my infanta, my princess; dream rose-coloured and mother-of-pearl dreams. If I can come across my Lord Fortunio, although it may cost me four horses, I shall send him to you."

With which fine peroration, George went out, not without kissing Jacintha, as he had done on entering.

XI

MUSIDORA awoke more joyous than usual. She had her mirror brought, and thought herself pretty, — somewhat pale, her eyes a little heavy, just enough to make her beauty delicately interesting. She said to herself, "If Fortunio could see me thus, I should be quite sure of victory."

FORTUNIO

Indeed, she was irresistible. But how are you going to overcome an enemy that flees and refuses to fight ?

The weather was rather fine for the season. A few bits of blue showed among the clouds, the wind had dried the roads. Musidora, usually very indifferent to the changes of the weather, and who had not many opportunities of ascertaining whether it was rainy or fine, felt extreme joy at the beauty of the day. She ran through the house with extraordinary vivacity, looking at all the clocks to see what was the time, and at all the vanes to see which way the wind was.

Jacintha, her faithful maid, helped her to put on an elegant sky-blue riding habit, a beaver hat with a green veil ; a riding whip from Verdier's and a neatly turned boot, — nothing was wanting. Musidora in that costume had a charmingly resolute and victorious air. Her curls, held in by a light net to resist the action of the wind, fell gracefully down her cheeks ; her figure, set off by the close-fitting waist of her habit, showed supple and slight above the ample, rich folds of the skirt ; her foot, naturally so tiny, became imperceptible, imprisoned as it was in the small boot.

Jack announced that her ladyship's mare was saddled and bridled, whereupon Musidora went down to the yard, and, Jack holding her stirrup, she sprang into the saddle with consummate lightness and skill. Then she touched her animal with the whip and went off like a flash. Jack galloped behind her and had the greatest difficulty in keeping up with her.

FORTUNIO

The long avenue of the Champs-Élysées was soon traversed. Musidora's mare had not been exercised for some time, and dashed forward impatiently. Although she was going at full speed, her mistress gave her her head and whipped her up. Musidora evidently had a presentiment that she would meet Fortunio that day. The mare, thus urged, galloped even faster, and seemed no longer to touch the ground. The passers-by were amazed at the boldness of the young woman. Sometimes a cry of terror broke from a carriage in which a frightened duchess threw herself back as she turned her head not to see the imprudent rider fall and be dashed to pieces; but Musidora was an excellent horsewoman, and sat her mare as if she were made fast to the saddle.

At the Maillot Gate she met Alfred, who was returning towards Paris. Alfred, surprised, attempted to swing his horse around and to gallop after her in order to declare his love and beg for relief to his sorrows, but he did not perform the movement very skilfully, lost a stirrup, and before he had regained his seat, Musidora was out of sight.

FORTUNIO

“The devil take it!” said he, bringing his horse to a walk, “there is a great chance lost. I shall wait for her at this gate, for it is probable that she will come out this way.”

And, for fear of missing her, Alfred stood sentry at the Maillot Gate as motionless as a carbineer on sentry before the Triumphal Arch of the Carrousel.

The Bois de Boulogne was still leafless; scarcely a few blades of green grass showed on the detritus of the last season's leaves; the red stems, sticky with sap, opened like the frames of umbrellas or fans from which the silk had been torn. Although there was no sun, the roads were already as dusty as after a hot summer. The Bois de Boulogne was as ugly as a fashionable wood can be, which is saying not a little.

Musidora, not much inclined by nature to pastoral woods, cared very little for the beauty of the prospect. That was not what had brought her to the Bois. She traversed every drive, particularly the Madrid Drive where George had met Fortunio, but in vain.

FORTUNIO

“What is the matter with Musidora?” said a young fellow who saw her passing by at full speed like a shadow carried away by the wind. “She is riding madly and leaping the barriers at the risk of breaking her neck. Is she trying to become a circus rider or a jockey? What mania has suddenly seized upon her?”

Once Musidora thought she saw Fortunio at the corner of a road. She dashed off in pursuit of him with renewed whipping and spurring. Her mare, maddened, reared, lashed out twice or thrice, and went off at score. The veins stood out upon her smoking, muscular neck, her flanks were heaving, foam flecked her bridle, and her speed was so great that her mane and tail stood out straight.

“Musidora!” cried George, who was riding in the opposite direction, “you will break your mare’s wind.”

The girl paid no attention, but continued her mad gallop. She was wonderfully beautiful. The speed at which she went had brought the roses to her cheeks, her eyes flashed, her fair, loosened hair flew behind, her heaving breast rose and fell, she breathed in strongly through her nostrils, holding her lips tightly closed so as not to be suffocated by the wind, her veil unrolled along her back in waving folds that gave her a transparent and ethereal aspect. Bradamante or Marphisa, the two lovely warriors, never looked prouder and more resolute on horseback.

FORTUNIO

Alas! it was not Fortunio; it was a very good-looking young fellow, who was much surprised to see a young woman dash at him at full speed and suddenly turn round without a word. Musidora, exceedingly disappointed, again met George, who was riding quietly along like a village priest mounted upon an ass.

“George,” she said, “take me home. I have lost my groom.”

George rode by her side, and they went out together by the Auteuil Gate.

“Why!” said de Marcilly, “it looks as if dear George had taken on Musidora again.”

“I think they never quite broke off,” answered his comrade.

“I must tell that to the Duchess of M——,” said de Marcilly, “she will lead George a fine life. What amazing stuff he will have to talk in order to get back into her good books!” And the two rode down another drive.

As for Alfred, whose nose, irritated by a sharp wind, was visibly getting redder, when he saw the mist rise on the horizon and the night coming on apace, he made a very judicious remark which ought to have occurred to him two hours earlier: "Why! it looks as if Musidora had gone out by another gate. That girl is really too capricious. I shall make up my mind to pay court to Phœbe; she has a very much better disposition."

FORTUNIO

Whereupon he spurred his horse, and got comfortably drunk that evening at the Café de Paris by way of consoling himself for his disappointment.

XII

THE lovely girl returned home, worn out, almost discouraged, and sadder than a professional gambler who has been refused twenty francs by his intimate friend in order to go back to the card-room. She threw herself on a sofa, and while Jacintha was unlacing her boots and undoing her dress, she began to weep bitterly, shedding the first tears which had ever moistened her sparkling eye, with its clear, cold glance, sharp and cutting like a dagger. When her mother died, she had not wept. It is true that her mother had sold her at the age of thirteen to an old English nobleman, and that she beat her to get her money out of her ; these facts had somewhat tempered in Musidora the impulses of filial love. She had seen carried away upon a stretcher the blood-stained body of young Willis, who had blown out his brains in despair at being unable to satisfy her extravagant wants, and she had not exhibited a trace of emotion. But she wept at not having met Fortunio. Her icy heart, colder and more barren than a Siberian winter, was at last melting under the warm breath of love and dissolving in a sweet shower of tears. These tears were her baptism into a new life.

FORTUNIO

There are diamond-like natures coldly brilliant and unnaturally hard. Nothing affects them ; no fire can melt, no acid dissolve them ; nothing can grind them down ; they tear with their sharp corners the weak and loving souls they meet on their way. The world charges them with being barbarous and cruel, but they merely obey a fatal law which requires that of two bodies which come in contact, the harder shall wear and cut the other. Why should a diamond cut diamond, and glass not cut diamond ? There is the whole question in a nutshell. Is it fair to accuse the diamond of being insensible ?

FORTUNIO

Musidora's nature was of that kind. She had lived indifferent and calm amidst disorder; she had plunged into shame like a diver in his bell, who sees turning round him the monstrous polyps and the hungry sharks that cannot reach him; her real existence was entirely separate from the one that went on outside it. Often it seemed to her that another woman who, by a curious accident, happened to have her name and figure, had done everything that she was charged with.

But let there turn up a soul of equal strength and power of resistance, and suddenly the angles are cut away, facets are formed, a monogram is engraved ineffaceably: diamond alone can cut diamond. Fortunio had succeeded in raying the hard armour of Musidora and in drawing his own image upon the metal which had resisted aqua fortis and the graver. The statue had become a woman. So in the fabulous days of antiquity, a young goatherd, endowed by Venus with resistless beauty, caused to spring from the hard and knotty heart of an oak a nymph smiling in all the splendour of her fair nudity.

Musidora feels a new soul blooming in her like a mysterious flower sown by Fortunio on the barren rock of her heart. Her love is full of the divine puer-ilities, of all the adorable childishness of pure, virgin passion. Musidora is, in truth, an innocent girl, who would blush at a word and tremble under a too burning glance. It is quite sincerely that she wears on her dear little heart the letter of the beloved Fortunio, that she goes to bed with it and kisses it twenty times a day. You may be quite sure that if the daisies were in bloom, she would pick the petals of one, saying, "He loves me a little, very much, not at all," like the artless Marguerite in Martha's garden.

FORTUNIO

Who has dared to say that there was in the world a certain Musidora, haughty, proud, capricious, depraved, venomous as a scorpion, and so wicked that people glanced under her dress to see if she did not have a cloven foot; a soulless, pitiless, remorseless Musidora, who deceived even her chosen lover; a vampire thirsting for gold and silver, drinking up the inheritance of eldest sons like a glass of soda water by way of appetiser; a mocking fiend, laughing discordantly at everything; a vile courtesan renewing the orgies of antiquity, without even having for excuse the ardours of Messalina?

Those who say these things are unquestionably in error. I do not know that Musidora, and I doubt whether she ever existed. Besides, I would not have taken so abominable a creature for my heroine. Scandal must not be believed. Men are so wicked that they manage to slander Tiberius and Nero.

FORTUNIO

The Musidora I know is softer and whiter than milk, a month-old lamb is not more candid; the scent of the early strawberries is less suave and spring-like than the perfume of her newly opened soul. In her young dreams she wanders innocently upon tender green meads by flowery hawthorn hedges; her sole desire is to inhabit a humble cabin by the bank of a limpid stream and to live in eternal solitude with her beloved. What girl of fifteen who has never been away from her mother's protection, could wish for chaster and simpler happiness? Nothing but her heart, without any accompaniment of Emir-green Thibet shawls, of sorrel horses, gems from Provost's, and a box at the Bouffes. O sancta simplicitas! as John Huss said on ascending the pile.

Yet this dream, so commonplace and apparently so easy of realisation, does not strike me as likely to come true very soon. Shall we have the luck to meet Fortunio at the Bois de Boulogne? It is doubtful, yet I have no other means of continuing my novel.

FORTUNIO

The Italian birds have fled from their gilded cage, so I must give up thinking of bringing Fortunio and Musidora together at a performance of "Anna Bolena" or "Don Giovanni." Fortunio does not go often to the Opera, and I do not want to upset my dear hero's habits. Meanwhile I keep supplied with Havana cigars a young fellow who is a friend of mine and who is mounting guard on the Boulevard de Gand watching for Fortunio, who sometimes walks there with his friend de Marcilly.

I had thought of making Musidora go back to the Madrid Drive and making her catch sight of Fortunio galloping at full speed. She would have rushed in pursuit of him, and her mare, shying at a branch, would have thrown her violently to the ground. Fortunio would have picked her up in a faint and taken her home, and could not in decency have helped coming to inquire after the invalid. Then would have come Musidora's confession, the emotion of the shy Fortunio, and the inevitable consequences. But this plan is worn out. In every novel you see nothing but women pursued by mad bulls, carriages stopped on the brink of a precipice, horses rearing and a stranger seizing their bridle, and no end of other fine inventions of the kind. Besides, when you are thrown from your horse, it is quite natural that you should break your shoulder bone, punch a hole in your head, smash your teeth or your nose; and I confess that I have taken too much pains to make Musidora a very pretty creature to run any risk of thus damaging her fine polished shoulders, her delicately shaped nose, her clean, well set teeth as white as those of a Newfoundland dog, in favour of which I have used up all that I possess in the way of crystalline comparisons. Do you think it would be pleasant to see that silky, fair hair turned into stiff, straight wisps full of coagulated blood? Perhaps it would be necessary to cut it off in order to dress the wound; I could not bear such a monstrosity as my heroine with her head shaved. It would be quite impossible for me to continue a story in which the heroine's head should be dressed Titus fashion; and I ask you, ladies, if anything could be more hateful than a princess in a novel who should look like a little boy.

FORTUNIO

It is a pretty hard task which I have undertaken. How the devil should I know what Fortunio is doing? There is no reason why I should know it any better than you. I have seen Fortunio but once, at supper, and the unfortunate idea came into my head to take him for my hero, believing that such a good-looking young fellow could not fail to have many romantic adventures. The ready welcome he received at every one's hands, the mysterious interest attached to his person, certain strange words which he had let fall between a smile and a toast had singularly predisposed me in his favour. Fortunio, you have deceived me! I expected merely to have to write at your dictation a marvellous story full of surprising incidents. On the contrary, I have got to invent everything, to rack my brains, to make my readers have patience until you are ready to present yourself and bow to the company. I have made you handsome, witty, generous, a millionaire, mysterious, noble, well-shod, with handsome neckties, — all rare and precious gifts. If you had had a fairy godmother, you could not have been better off. And how many pages have you given me in return, you ungrateful Fortunio? Not more than a dozen. O Hyrcanian ferocity! O unparalleled callousness! A dozen pages in return for twenty-four perfections! It is scant.

FORTUNIO

In order to fill up the space which you should have filled up alone, poor Musidora has had to mourn beyond measure, George to get as drunk as innumerable lords, Alfred to utter a greater number of stupidities than usual, Cynthia to show her back and breasts, Phœbe her legs, and Arabella her dress. If I have been improper in introducing my reader into Musidora's bathroom, because I did not know where else to take him, you alone are the cause of it. You have compelled me to spin out my description and to go counter to Horace's precept, semper ad eventum festina. If my novel is poor, it is your fault. May it weigh lightly upon you! I have spelled the words as well as I could, and hunted out in the dictionary those I was not sure of. You who were my hero, you ought to have furnished me with incredible events, Platonic and other passions, duels, elopements, dagger-thrusts. It was in return for this that I provided you with all possible qualities. If you go on in this way, my dear Fortunio, I shall have to say that you are ugly, a fool, commonplace, without a sou to your name. I cannot go and look for you at the street corners like a betrayed woman who waits in the pouring rain to see her faithless lover come forth from his new mistress's house, and catch hold of him by the tail of his coat. If you had a janitor, I could go and ask your story of him, but you have not one, since you have not a house, and consequently have not a door. O Caliope, Muse of the brazen trump, sustain my breath! What the devil am I to say in the next chapter? I have nothing left to do but to put Musidora to death. Do you see, Fortunio, to what extremities you have reduced me? I created a pretty woman to be your mistress, and I am compelled to kill her at page 127 contrary to custom, which does not permit the bubble swollen with love sighs and called heroine of a novel, to be pricked until page 216 or thereabouts.

FORTUNIO

FORTUNIO

XIII

THE days passed, and Fortunio did not show up. Musidora's quest had been utterly fruitless. Arabella's remark, "Fortunio is not a man, he is a dream," recurred to her memory. And indeed, once seen, he was so handsome that it was easy to believe him a supernatural vision. The noisy brilliancy in the midst of which he had appeared to Musidora greatly helped out this poetic illusion, and sometimes she doubted its reality; as some one might who had seen heaven open for a moment and afterwards, finding it inexorably closed, had come to believe himself the dupe of a hallucination due to fever.

FORTUNIO

Her familiar friends brought her perfidious consolation, with airs of ironical condolence and faces that were joyously sad. Cynthia advised her, with all the generous sincerity of her kindly heart, to take another lover, because that would always occupy her a little; but Musidora replied that this remedy, which might do for Phœbe or Arabella, was in no wise suited to her. Then Cynthia kissed her tenderly on the forehead, and withdrew, saying, "Povera innamorata! I shall have a novena said to the Madonna for the success of your love."

And this she did religiously.

Musidora, seeing that every gleam of hope had died out and that Fortunio was more lost than ever, became thoroughly disgusted with life and turned over in her lovely head the most sinister projects. Like a courageous girl, she resolved not to survive her first love.

"At least," she said to herself, "since I have seen the man I was to love, I will not be low enough to permit any other to touch my dress with the tip of his finger. I am now consecrated. Ah! if I could only take back and suppress my life! If I could only strike out from the number of my days all that have not been devoted to you, dear and mysterious Fortunio! I had a vague presentiment that you existed somewhere, sweet and proud, witty and beautiful, a lightning gleam in your calm eyes, an indulgent smile on your divine lips, like an angel come down to live among men. Once I saw you, my whole heart went out to you; with a single glance you seized upon my soul; I felt that I belonged to you, and I recognised in you my master and my conqueror. I understood that it would be impossible for me ever to love any one else than you, and that the centre of my life was forever displaced. I am punished for not waiting for you, but now I know that you exist. You are no phantom; you are not merely a charming image evoked in my heated brain by my hot heart. I have heard you, seen you, touched you; I have done my best to find you, to cast myself at your feet, to beseech you to forgive me and to love me a little. You have escaped from me like an evanescent shadow, — all that is left me is to die. To know that you are not a dream and to go on living is impossible.”

FORTUNIO

Musidora turned over in her mind ever so many ways of committing suicide. First she thought of drowning herself, but the Seine was very yellow and muddy; then the thought of being fished out of the Saint-Cloud nets and stretched naked upon the black, sticky slabs of the Morgue proved singularly repugnant to her. For a moment she thought of blowing out her brains, but she had not a pistol, and besides, no woman cares to disfigure herself, even after death. She has a certain funereal vanity ; she wants to be a presentable corpse.

FORTUNIO

She rather fancied a knife-thrust in the heart, but she was afraid of recoiling at the touch of steel and of not striking firmly enough. She wished to kill herself in real earnest and not merely to make an interesting wound.

Finally she settled on poison. I may assure my readers that the commonplace and inelegant idea of asphyxiating herself with a brazier of lighted charcoal did not occur to my heroine. She knew too well how to live, to go and die in that fashion. Suddenly a thought flashed into her brain ; she recalled Fortunio's needle.

"I shall prick my breast with the needle, and that will be the end of it. Death will be sweet since it will come from Fortunio," said she, as she drew the needle from one of the divisions of the pocket-book. She carefully looked at the sharp point, dulled by a sort of reddish coating, and placed it upon a table by her side. Then she put on a wrapper of white muslin, fastened a white rose in her hair, and stretched herself out on the sofa, after having first drawn aside the folds of her dress and brought out her round, white breast, in order to prick it more readily. She was certainly resolved to kill herself, but I am bound to confess that she did not hurry the preparations. Some vague and secret hope still kept her back.

FORTUNIO

“I shall prick myself at sharp noon,” she said to herself.

It was then a quarter to twelve. Whatever may be the explanation of the strange caprice, it is certain that Musidora would have been very sorry to die at a quarter to twelve.

While Time dropped in his hourglass the sands of the fatal quarter of an hour, a thought occurred to Musidora: Did that poison cause much suffering before death? Did it leave on the body red or black spots? She would have liked to see its effects. In the days of Cleopatra, in the days of antiquity, there would have been no difficulty about the matter. She would have sent for five or six male or female slaves and tried the poison on them; she would have performed what the doctors call an experiment in anima vili. A dozen poor wretches would have writhed like eels cut to pieces on the handsome porphyry pavement and the brilliant mosaics, while their mistress, leaning carelessly upon the shoulder of a young Asiatic child, watched with her velvet glance their last agonising spasm. Everything has degenerated nowadays, and the prodigious life of that gigantic world is no longer understood by us. Our virtues and our crimes are shapeless.

FORTUNIO

Having no slaves on whom she could try her needle, Musidora, very much perplexed, held it in her fingers three inches from her breast, envying Cleopatra's fate, who at least had seen, before she yielded her life to the venomous kiss of the asp, what she would have to suffer to join her dear Anthony.

Just as Musidora was plunged in this maze of uncertainty, her English cat emerged from below a piece of furniture and came to her with soft purring. Seeing that her mistress did not pay any attention to her advances, she sprang into her lap and moved her hand with her little, cold, pink nose. She arched her back as she looked at her mistress with round eyes cut by a pupil in the shape of a capital I, and expressed her pleasure at being caressed by the soft purring peculiar to cats and to tigers.

FORTUNIO

A devilish idea occurred to Musidora, as she petted the cat. She pricked its head with the needle. The cat leaped up, sprang to the floor, made two or three attempts to walk, then fell as if seized with vertigo; its sides heaved, its tail faintly beat the floor, a shudder ran through its body; its eyes filled with a greenish gleam and then died out. It was dead. The whole thing had lasted scarcely a few seconds.

“That is good,” said Musidora; “evidently one does not suffer much;” and she put the needle to her breast.

She was just about to scratch her white skin with it, when the low rumble of a carriage passing at full gallop under the gateway reached her ear, and for a moment delayed the carrying out of her project. She rose and looked out of the window.

A carriage, to which were harnessed four dapple-gray horses so absolutely alike and so thorough-bred that they would have been taken for Arab horses of the Prophet’s breed, was just then passing round the sanded court. The postilions wore pale-green jackets with Musidora’s colours. There was no one in the carriage.

FORTUNIO

Musidora did not know what to make of it, when Jacintha handed her a note which had been given her by one of the postilions. Its contents were as follows :

“ Madam :

“ My shy ways have made you lose a carriage, which is not right. This one is better than George’s. Pray accept it in exchange. If you should desire to try it, the Neuilly Road is a very fine one, and you could try your horses’ speed. I should be happy to meet you there.

“ FORTUNIO.”

XIV

It is easy to imagine the delighted amazement of Musidora. She passed suddenly and without any transition from the deepest depression to the liveliest joy. Fortunio, who had fled, who was not to be found, who was so shy, surrendered of his own accord at the very moment when she least expected it. The triumphal clarions sounded already joyously in Musidora’s ear, for she no longer doubted that she was victorious, and felt sure that she would storm Fortunio’s heart without striking a blow. O ever up-springing hope, how obstinately you raise your elastic and supple branches bent under the heavy tread of disappointment, and how little time do you need to bloom into graceful flowers and to send out vigorous branches in every direction ! Here is a girl who but a moment since was paler than the alabaster statue that would have been placed upon her tomb and whose blue veins seemed to mark marble rather than living flesh, and she now skips through the room singing as joyously as a sparrow in the month of May.

FORTUNIO

“Jacintha, Jacintha ! Quick ! Dress me, put on my shoes, — I am going out.”

“What dress will you wear, madam ? ” replied Jacintha, weighing each word to give her time to reflect.

“Any one,” said the girl, with a charmingly impatient gesture, “and please be quick. You are slower than a tortoise. One would think you carried a shell on your back.”

Jacintha brought a white dress with narrow, very pale rose stripes which gave it a delicate flesh tint, something like that of the hortensia bursting into bloom. Musidora put it on without a corset, so eager was she to go. Besides, she ran no risk in doing so, for she was one of the very few women who do not fall to pieces when they are undressed. Then she wrapped herself in a great white cashmere which came down to her heels, and Jacintha placed delicately on her head the freshest, most graceful, most delightfully coquettish bonnet imaginable. I dare not describe in vile prose such a masterpiece. Be satisfied, ladies, with knowing that the brim, which was not very broad, was lined with an airy garland of little wild-flowers which formed around Musidora's lovely face a charming aureole for which more than one saint would willingly have exchanged her golden nimbus. Imagine a great camellia with an angel's face for a heart! Her small shoes, like the wing of a scarabæus, so cut away that they scarcely covered the toes, showed under the hem of her dress and readily suggested that they covered feet belonging to the prettiest legs in the world. Excessively fine stockings showed through their open-worked embroidery the rose-flushed skin of the adorable feet.

FORTUNIO

Musidora scarcely took time to put on her gloves, went downstairs and got into the carriage.

"To Neuilly!" she said to the groom who put up the steps. The carriage went off like a flash.

"Why!" said Jacintha, stumbling against the body of the cat, which she had not yet perceived, "Blanchette is dead! Here, Jack, look at your brute. It is dead. Your mistress will make a fine row about it to-night when she comes home."

FORTUNIO

Jack, terrified, knelt down by the cat, pulled its tail, pinched its ears, rubbed its nose with a handkerchief dipped in cologne, but alas! all in vain.

“Oh, the wicked brute! it died on purpose to have me beaten by my mistress,” said the negro boy, rolling his eyes with an air of comical terror; “and her hand is so heavy!”

“Hold your tongue, you fool! Do you suppose that Madam would lower herself to beat you? She will have you whipped by Zamora,” replied Jacintha, majestically. “And to tell the truth, you thoroughly deserve it. You have only a cat to look after, and you let it die like a dog, — poor little thing!”

“Oh, oh!” cried the little negro, as if he already felt upon his shoulders the shower of blows which was reserved for him.

“You can howl by and by,” said Jacintha, who took pleasure in increasing the negro’s terror; “you know that Zamora detests you, and he has a strong arm. He will flay you alive like an eel; you can reckon on that, Master Jack.”

Jack picked up the cat, carried it to its cradle, bent its four paws under it, arranged its tail in a circle, opened its eyes so as to give it an appearance of life, then hid himself in a hay-loft behind a pile of hay until the storm should have passed, taking care to put in his pockets a bottle of wine, bread, and a piece of cold meat.

FORTUNIO

Since I am talking about the cat, let me clear Musidora of the charge of cruelty which may be brought against her for having killed her favourite pet. Musidora thought that she was going to die herself, and that perhaps the cat, after her death, would be reduced to travelling on the roofs in snow and rain, exposed to the horrors of famine; a most afflicting prospect. She was cruel through kindness. Besides, she has had it very nicely stuffed and placed under a glass edged with red plush. It lies upon a little sky-blue pillow, and its beautiful enamelled eyes are green, exactly as if it were alive. You could almost swear you heard it purring. Which of us can hope to be stuffed and put under glass after death? Which of us will ever be regretted as much as a long-haired cat or a trained dog?

XV

THE postilions in their pale-green jackets cracked their whips joyously, and the carriage went at such a pace that the wheels looked like a shining disc, the spokes of which could not be made out. The dust they raised had not time to settle before the carriage was already out of sight. The best-driven equipages were left behind, and yet the dapple-gray horses had not turned a hair. Their fine thoroughbred legs travelled rapidly over the road which fled past them gray and rayed like a ribbon that is being rolled up.

FORTUNIO

Musidora, carelessly leaning back upon the cushions, indulged in the most amorous anticipations.⁶ Her bright complexion was illumined with happiness, and her little hand, encased in a white glove, and resting on the edge of the carriage, beat time to an air which she hummed to herself. Her delight was so great that from time to time she burst out laughing spasmodically and almost feverishly; she felt as if she must shout, leap out and run as fast as she could, or do something equally violent in order to let off steam. All her languor had vanished. The girl who yesterday had to be carried to her bath, who could scarcely lift her feet to ascend the stairs, would now have thought nothing of performing the twelve labours of Hercules. Curiosity, desire, and love, the three terrible levers, any one of which could move the world, excited the faculties of her soul to their highest pitch. Every fibre in her being was stretched to breaking and vibrated like the chords of a lyre.

FORTUNIO

She was about to see Fortunio, to hear him, to speak to him, to feed on the divine food of his beauty, to suspend her soul to his lips, to drink in each of his words, more precious than the diamonds which fall from the mouth of the virtuous maidens in Perrault's Tales. Ah! to breathe the air which he breathed, to be caressed by the same sunbeam that played on his black hair, to look at a tree or a prospect on which his glance had rested, to have something in common with him, meant ineffable enjoyment, a world of secret ecstasy. At the thought Musidora's heart leaped in her breast.

The dandies set off at a gallop to see the face of the unknown duchess drawn by this equipage, and more than one nearly fell off with admiration. Musidora, who at any other time would have been flattered by the sensation she created, did not pay the least attention to it. She was no longer a coquette. A real metamorphosis had taken place in her. Nothing was left of the Musidora of old but her name and her beauty. Even her beauty had no longer the same character.

FORTUNIO

Until now she had been wittily beautiful; now she was passionately lovely.

No doubt it will be thought unlikely that such a change should have occurred so suddenly, and that so great a love should have resulted from a single meeting. Whereto I shall answer that truth is stranger than fiction, and that fiction always has an appearance of probability because it is combined, arranged, and worked out beforehand to produce the effect of truth. Electroplate often looks more like silver plate than silver plate itself. Next, I will point out that a woman's heart is a labyrinth so full of twists, turns, and obscure nooks, that even the greatest poets, who have ventured into it bearing in their hand the golden lamp of genius, have not always managed to find their way about, and that no one can boast of the possession of the thread which leads to the exit from that maze. As far as women are concerned, anything may be expected from them, especially absurdity.

Many respectable people will no doubt be of the opinion that the lightning-bolts of love are mere romantic illusions, and that no one falls madly in love with a man or a woman who has been seen but once. For myself it is my belief that if one does not love a person at first sight, there is no reason to love her when she is seen a second time and still less reason when she is seen a third.

FORTUNIO

Then Musidora had to fall in love with Fortunio, otherwise my novel could not have been written. Also, my hero, rich, young, handsome, witty, mysterious, must of necessity have been adored at first sight. Many others, who do not have one-half these qualities, are just as successful. And what is there strange in a young woman loving a handsome young man? So, whether the thing is reasonable or not, Musidora adores Fortunio, whom she does not know or whom she has seen but once, which is the same thing. And this digression does not prevent her carriage from flying rapidly along the great avenue of the Champs-Élysées and passing the Arc de l'Étoile, the gigantic gate which opens on space.

Nature on that day wore a very different aspect from that which it had when Musidora was traversing the Bois de Boulogne in every direction on the chance of meeting Fortunio. The dark red of the buds had been replaced by tender green, the colour of hope, and the birds were warbling joyous promises on the branches; the heavens, with floating masses of white clouds, looked like a great blue eye gazing lovingly upon earth. A sweet scent of new foliage and of green grass rose in the air like the incense of spring. Little yellow butterflies fluttered about the flowers, and played in the luminous rays which struck across the green background of the landscape. Infinite delight filled heaven and earth; everything breathed joy and life; the atmosphere was impregnated with youth and happiness,—at least, that was Musidora's feeling. She saw everything through the prism of passion.

FORTUNIO

Passions are like yellow, blue, and red glasses, which give their colour to everything. Thus a prospect which, in a moment of despair appeared hideous, repulsive, bare as bones, repellent in its wretchedness and ugliness, and more inhospitable than a Scythian steppe, when looked at through the glass of happiness appears diapered with flowers, sparkling with shining waters, green sward, distant horizons,—in a word, a real earthly paradise. Nature is somewhat like a great symphony which each one interprets in his own way. One man hears the last cry of Jesus expiring on the cross, while his neighbour, on the other hand, believes he is listening to the pearly trills of the nightingale and the shrill piping of shepherds.

FORTUNIO

Musidora was just then interpreting the symphony in the amorous and pastoral mode.

The carriage drove on; the great trees, bending their crests, flew by to right and left like a routed army, and yet Fortunio did not appear. Musidora began to feel anxious. Suppose Fortunio had changed his mind! She read his note again; it seemed plain enough, and she felt somewhat reassured.

At last she perceived at the very end of the avenue a little whirlwind of white dust which rapidly drew near. She felt so deeply moved that she was obliged to lean back in the carriage; the blood surged through her veins; her cheeks flushed and paled; her hand dropped the note, which she had pressed with almost convulsive vigour. The supreme moment was approaching which was to decide her fate.

Soon the cloud of dust, opening like a classical cloud enshrouding a deity, allowed her to make out a black horse with long mane and tail, arched neck, narrow shoulders, clean fetlocks, fiery eyes and nostrils, resembling more a hippogriff than an ordinary quadruped. The horse was bestridden by a horseman who was none else than Fortunio in person. A short distance behind him galloped a thick-lipped Moor.

FORTUNIO

It was indeed Fortunio, with that air of careless security which he never lost, and which gave him so much ascendancy over every one. It seemed as though none of the ills to which man is heir could touch him; that he felt himself above the attacks of fate. Serenity reigned on his beautiful face as on a pedestal of marble.

He advanced towards the carriage, making his horse perform prodigious curvetings. Sometimes he made it leap into the air, sometimes rear up and proceed on its hind-legs. The noble animal lent itself to all his exigencies with marvellous coquetry and grace. It seemed to seek to rival its master in gracefulness and boldness. They appeared to be but one creature animated by one soul; for Fortunio had neither spur nor whip, and did not even hold the bridle in his hands. He guided his steed by imperceptible means, and it was quite impossible to see by what method he transmitted his wishes to the intelligent animal.

When within fifty yards of the carriage, he sent his horse at top speed until within a foot of the victoria. Musidora, terrified at the thought that he must be dashed against the wheels, uttered a great cry; but Fortunio, by a skilful trick well known to Arab horsemen, suddenly pulled up his horse and passed without transition from the most rapid pace to the most complete immobility. One could have sworn that an enchanter had spellbound horse and rider. After this he made his barb — for it was a barb — curvet by the carriage door, and as he made him kick violently, he bowed to Musidora with the same grace and the same ease as if he were standing on the solid floor of a drawing-room.

FORTUNIO

“Madam,” said he, “pardon a poor savage who in his long travels through the East and India has forgotten the ways of European gallantry, and who scarcely knows now how to behave with ladies. If I had been presumptuous enough to suppose you wished for my presence, be assured I should have hastened to you with all the speed that Tippoo is capable of; but I could not suppose that an extravagant fellow like myself, whom travels in far regions have made eccentric, could in any wise even pique your curiosity.”

I should much like to tell you what was Musidora’s reply, but I never learned it. All I know is that she opened her lips as she raised to Fortunio’s face her beautiful, brilliant, melting eyes. She murmured something, but I listened in vain and could not catch a single syllable. The sand grinding under the wheels and the trampling of the horses no doubt drowned Musidora's inarticulate voice. I greatly regret it, for it would have been interesting to collect these precious words.

FORTUNIO

"Musidora," went on Fortunio, in a soft, yet sonorous voice, "no doubt you have been told many strange things about me. My friends are very imaginative. What will you think when you find out that far from being the hero of a novel, a mysterious being, the victim of fate, I am simply an ordinary fellow, rather good-natured, although capricious and occasionally fantastic. I assure you, Musidora, that I drink wine and not molten gold at my meals; that I eat more oysters than pearls dissolved in vinegar; that I sleep in a bed, although more generally I lie in a hammock, and that I usually walk on my hind-legs, unless I borrow those of Tippoo, Zerlina, or Agandecca, my favourite mare. That is my way of life. I prefer verse to prose, music to verse. There is nothing in the world I hold superior to a painting by Titian except a beautiful woman. I have no other political opinions. I hate my friends only, and I should be rather inclined to be a philanthropist if men were monkeys. I should be willing enough to believe in God if only

FORTUNIO

He were not so like a parish beadle, and I think roses are more useful than cabbages. Now you know me as well as if you had lived with me for ten years. And this is about all the information I can give about myself, for really I know nothing more."

Musidora could not help laughing at Fortunio's profession of faith.

"Really," she said, "you are very modest if you think you are not eccentric, for, Mr. Fortunio, you are very much so."

"I? Not at all. I am the most commonplace individual in the world. I eat only what I like and I live for myself alone. But the sun is getting hot and your parasol will soon be insufficient to protect you from its burning rays. Will you not do me the pleasure to rest for a moment in a hut, a sort of Indian wigwam, which I have close by? You could return to Paris this evening in the cool of the twilight."

"Willingly," replied Musidora. "I shall not be sorry to see your veranda, your wigwam, as you call it, for I am told that you do not live anywhere, but that you roost."

"Sometimes, but not always. I have spent more than one night in a tree, fastened by my sash to the trunk so that I should not break my head by falling backwards; but here I live like the most debonair of civilians. All I need is a red-tiled roof and green blinds to pass for the most Arcadian and sentimental fellow in the world. Hadji! Hadji! Come here, I have something to tell you."

FORTUNIO

In a couple of strides the Moor was by Fortunio's side. Fortunio spoke a few words in a foreign tongue with a guttural and strange intonation. Hadji immediately went off at full speed.

"Pardon me, madam, for speaking in your presence in an unknown tongue, but that rascal does not know a word of French or any other Christian language."

"I hope," said Musidora, "that you have not sent him to make any preparations on my account. Do you propose to have me received at the foot of your steps by a deputation of young girls dressed in white, with bouquets wrapped in paper? I insist that you shall not stand on ceremony with me."

"I merely sent Hadji," answered Fortunio, "to put my tame lion and Betsy, my tigress, in their cages. They are charming animals, as gentle as lambs, but you might have been startled at the sight of them. I am very old-maidish in this respect, — I cannot do without animals. My house is a regular menagerie.”

FORTUNIO

“Are the bars of the cages solid?” said Musidora, rather alarmed.

“Oh, very solid,” replied Fortunio, laughing. “Here we are.”

XVI

FORTUNIO’S house had no façade. Two rock-work terraces with corners of vermiculated stone, steps with pot-bellied balustrades, and pedestals supporting great vases of blue china filled with cacti, in the taste of the time of Louis XIII, rose on either side of a massive oaken gate admirably carved and adorned with two medallions of Roman emperors surrounded with wreaths. These two terraces formed a sort of bastion, which kept off inquisitive looks. Below them were the stables. The carriage with its four horses dashed at full gallop against the gate, which opened, turning on its hinges as if by magic without any one appearing to throw it back. The carriage drove round a great sanded court surrounded by box-wood arcades, and thus gave my heroine time to look at the house of the beloved Fortunio.

FORTUNIO

At the back of the court sparkled in the bright sunshine a building of white stones joined with such care that it seemed cut out of one block. Niches framed richly, and filled with antique busts, alone broke the surface of the wall, which was entirely devoid of windows. A bronze door, over which quivered the shadow of a striped awning, opened in the centre of the building. Three steps of white marble — on either side of which lay two sphinxes, their paws crossed under their pointed breasts — led to the door.

The carriage stopped under the awning. Fortunio got down, raised the lovely girl, and placed her gently on the upper step. Then he touched the door, which slid into the wall and closed as soon as they had entered.

They found themselves in a broad hall lighted from above, out of which four doors opened. It was paved with a mosaic representing pigeons perched on the edge of a great cup, bending to drink in it, with scrolls, flowers, and festoons, — the veritable mosaic of Zosimus of Pergamos which antiquarians believed lost.

Pillars of yellow breccia, half engaged in the wall, supported an attic delicately carved, and formed a frame for waxed paintings, on the black background of which were represented dancers of antiquity, lightly lifting up their tunics, curving their white, slender arms like the handles of alabaster amphoræ, or waving their hands, which bore sonorous crotala. Never were more graceful silhouettes painted on the walls of Herculaneum or Pompeii.

FORTUNIO

Musidora stopped to look at them.

“Oh, do not look at these daubs,” said Fortunio, showing Musidora into a room on the side. “Confess that you expected something better. You must consider me a somewhat poor imitation of Sardanapalus, for until now I have offered to your gaze but mean enjoyments. My Asiatic and Babylonian splendours are very imperfect, and I scarcely manage to attain the mediocritas aurea of Horace. A hermit might live here.”

In point of fact, the room into which he had led Musidora was exceedingly plain. It had no other furniture than a very low divan which ran around it. The walls, the ceiling, the floor were covered with exceedingly fine matting adorned with brilliant patterns. Through blinds of China reeds, kept damp with scented water, showed the soft outlines of the distant landscape; the windows were glazed with white panes adorned with red vine-leaves. In the centre of the ceiling, in a sort of round window, was fitted a glass globe filled with clear, limpid water, in which swam blue fishes with golden fins. Their constant motion filled the room with changing prismatic reflections which produced the most curious effect. Exactly below the globe a small jet of water shot up in a slender crystal thread, that wavered at the least breath and fell back into a porphyry basin in pearly, sparkling spray. In one corner swung a palm-leaf hammock, and in the other stood a magnificent hookah, its supple black rings twisted around the rock-crystal vase adorned with silver filigree-work in which the smoke was cooled. And that was all.

FORTUNIO

“Sit down, fair queen,” said Fortunio, cleverly removing Musidora’s shawl, as he led her by the hand to the corner of the divan. “Place this cushion behind you, this one under your elbow, and this under your feet. There, that is right. I tell you, Orientals alone know how to sit down properly, and one of their poets wrote these two lines, which contain more sense than all the philosophies in the world: ‘It is better to be seated than standing, to be lying down than seated, to be dead than lying down.’ Match me in all the lamentations of our fashionable rimesters this distich of good Ferid ed din Atar's."

FORTUNIO

As he said these words, Fortunio stretched himself out upon the palm-leaf matting beside Musidora.

"Well, you are lying down, so you have reached the second degree of happiness," said Musidora. "This morning I came very near passing to the third."

"What?" said Fortunio, raising himself on his elbow. "You nearly died this morning? Is it only your shadow that I see? No, you are very much alive," and to make sure of it, he took her foot and kissed it. "I can feel your soft, warm skin through this fine net-work."

"All the same, if your note had not come at five minutes to twelve, I should now be white and cold, and secure for a long time in the delight of being laid out horizontally. At noon I was going to kill myself."

"However passionately Oriental I am, I share Ferid ed din's opinion only up to the half of his second line. The last hemistich is excellent for men who are merely not millionaires, and for women whom ugliness compels to be virtuous; you are not of them. What motive could you have had to adopt the violent resolution to slay yourself at noon exactly?"

FORTUNIO

“I do not know. I had the vapours; the blue devils were worrying me; I was quite worn out, — I did not know how to spend my day; so that, unable to kill time, I concluded to kill myself, and I should certainly have done it if the wish to try your carriage had not recalled me to life.”

“Many people that I am acquainted with have satisfied themselves with much less good reasons to live than that one. One of my friends, who had already put the barrel of his pistol into his mouth, very fortunately remembered that he had forgotten to write his epitaph. The notion of not having an epitaph was distinctly unpleasant to him. He laid his pistol on the table, took a sheet of paper, and wrote the following verses : —

‘Over cruel Fate the will doth triumph,
The feeblest mortal destiny may conquer
If he has courage and —’

Here my unfortunate friend stopped for lack of a rime. He scratched his head and bit his fingers, but in vain; he rang for a servant and had him bring a dictionary of rimes which he read from end to end without finding what he wanted; for there is no rime to ‘triumph.’ De Marcilly happened to come in and took him off to a gambling-house, where he won a hundred thousand francs that set him going again. Since that time he has led a jolly life, and never kisses the barrel of his pistols. This most true story proves the usefulness of difficult rimes in the composition of epitaphs."

FORTUNIO

"Oh, Fortunio, you are cruel and sarcastic!" said Musidora, with a slight accent of reproach. "Do you suppose that unrequited love is not a very good reason for dying?"

Fortunio fixed his limpid eyes upon her with an expression of infinite sweetness, then with a quick motion, he sprang from his matting to the divan, and putting one of his arms behind her he pressed her to him.

"Why, who told you, child, that your love was disdained?"

A frightful growl, hoarse and guttural, was heard not far from the room. Musidora rose terrified.

"It is only my tigress, which scents me and wants to see me. The devil of a brute has broken her chain. She is always doing it. Excuse me, madam, I shall tie her up more carefully and talk to her a little to calm her. She is as jealous of me as if she were a woman."

FORTUNIO

Fortunio took up a Malay creese concealed under the cushion, and went out. Musidora heard him playing with the tigress in the corridor. Fortunio spoke in an unknown tongue which the tigress seemed to understand, and to which she replied with low roars. The joyous beating of her tail sounded on the wall like the blows of a flail. After a few moments the sound died away, and Fortunio returned. He had changed his riding costume and wore a remarkably magnificent dress: a brocade caftan with wide sleeves, bound around the waist with a golden cord, fell in handsome folds around his graceful and robust form; on his head was a cap of red velvet embroidered in gold and pearls, with a long tassel hanging down his back. His hair, naturally curly, fell in the most picturesque black spirals; his bare feet were at ease in Turkish slippers; full, striped silk drawers completed his dress. Through his open shirt could be seen the whiteness of his marble chest, on which shone a small amulet adorned with embroidery and spangles, very like the small bags which Neapolitan fishermen wear around their necks. Was it, in Fortunio's case, a matter of superstition, eccentricity, caprice, a tender souvenir, or mere love of local colour? No one has ever known. What is certain is that the bright colours of the shining amulet brought out wonderfully the marble whiteness of his supple, polished flesh.

FORTUNIO

"Musidora," said he, as he re-entered the room, "are you hungry or thirsty? Let us try to get something to eat and drink. You will forgive the defects of a country household managed by a half-wild fellow who, so far as cookery goes, knows only how to dress elephants' feet and bisons' humps. Come this way," said he, raising the portière; "do not be afraid."

Fortunio, having put his arm around Musidora's waist like Othello leading out Desdemona, made his trembling beauty enter a small room decorated in the Pompadour style. It was hung with rose damask with a pattern of silver flowers; there were paintings by Watteau above the doors, and the ceiling represented an apple-green sky dappled with cloudlets and peopled with swarms of puffy cupids casting flowers broadcast. Although it was bright daylight everywhere else, it was night in the small drawing-room, for it is ignoble and utterly unworthy of a man who professes elegant sensuality to eat save by candle-light. Two chandeliers, fastened by red and silver cords harmonising with the hangings, hung from the ceiling. Ten candelabra, laden with tapers, intertwining their capricious branches with the borders of the bays, shed a dazzling light upon the gilded furniture and the hangings. At the back, under a baldacchino with silver tassels, spread out like a gigantic bed, a marvellous sofa of white satin brocaded with gold. In every corner were shelves and cabinets in old lacquer-work, covered with Chinese figures, Japanese vases, and porcelain figures. It was a regular great lady's boudoir.

FORTUNIO

Fortunio took an arm-chair and placed it exactly in the centre of the room. He placed another opposite to it and sat down, after requesting Musidora to do the same.

"Now let us eat," he said in the most serious fashion possible. "I have more appetite than I expected," and he pulled up his cuffs like a man about to carve.

Musidora looked at him with some anxiety, and for a moment feared he had lost his reason, though he seemed perfectly self-possessed; yet there was nothing in the room to indicate preparations for a meal, neither table nor attendants. Suddenly two leaves of the floor fell back, and to the great surprise of Musidora, a splendidly lighted table rose slowly, accompanied by two maids. The figures and ornaments of the centrepiece, every part of which sparkled with light, were so brilliant as to eclipse the very orb of day itself. The water-green of the malachite urns, in which the champagne was shivering in its thin glass robe under the white crystals of ice, contrasted happily with the red tones of the gold. Baskets of gold and silver filigree-work of the most precious workmanship, with patterns more delicate and exquisitely wrought than lace, were filled with the rarest fruits: grapes red and yellow as amber, huge crimson peaches, pineapples with saw-edged leaves, giving out a warm, tropical scent, and cherries and strawberries of uncommon size. The first fruits of spring and the last presents which autumn pours out from its late basket met on this table, amazed at being for the first time brought face to face. The seasons and the ordinary course of nature did not appear to exist, so far as Fortunio was concerned.

FORTUNIO

From porphyry bowls rose pyramids of West Indian preserves, roses, pomegranates, oranges, lemons,—everything, indeed, that the most luxurious gormandism could collect in the way of refined, exquisite, and ruinously rare confections. I have, contrary to the usual custom, begun by the dessert, but is not the dessert the whole of the dinner for a pretty woman?

FORTUNIO

However, in order to reassure the reader, who might think these dishes not very substantial for a hero of the size and strength of Fortunio, I shall add that in blazoned dishes, admirably chased, and placed upon braziers of platinum inlaid with niello, smoked roast quails surrounded by chaplets of ortolans, fish-balls, game stews, and for chief dish a China pheasant with its feathers on, and besides all this, milt of red mullet, cray fish, and other stimulants to drink.

Champagne, the only wine I have named, may seem too frivolous and of too transitory a sparkle for so serious a toper as Fortunio. Flagons of Bohemian glass embroidered with golden arabesques, contained within their transparent form enough to produce a proper and suitable intoxication: Tokay wine, such as Metternich himself never drank; Johannisberger, six times superior to the nectar of the gods so far as savour and bouquet go; real wine of Shiraz, of which at the time this story was written there were only two bottles in Europe, the one owned by George and the other by de Marcilly, who kept them under triple locks for some supreme occasion.

“Fortunio, you have not kept your word, you have indulged, on my account, in frightful extravagance,” said Musidora, in a tone of friendly reproach. "Did you expect company? This collation might serve a Gamache or a Gargantua."

FORTUNIO

"Not at all, dear queen. I have not made the least preparation, for no one loathes ceremony more than I do. I am of the opinion that cordiality is the best sauce. This is a mere stand-by which is always kept ready for me day and night, so that if I happen to be hungry at any time, there is no necessity to go to the yard, to wring a chicken's neck, pluck it, and spit it. As I have told you, I am of most patriarchal simplicity: I eat only when hungry and drink only when thirsty; when I am sleepy, I go to bed. But I beg of you, my angel, to remember that you are at table. You are taking nothing, and your food remains on your plate untouched. Do not fear to cause me disenchantment by dining with a good appetite. I do not share Lord Byron's views on this point, and besides, I do not like wings. I should be very sorry, madam, if you were merely a vapour."

In spite of Fortunio's request, Musidora was satisfied with nibbling at a few sweets and drinking two or three glasses of rosy tea, with a small glass of Barbadoes cream. Her emotion had destroyed her appetite, and the presence of the ideal of her heart moved her to such an extent that she could scarcely carry her fork to her mouth. What perfect happiness, to dine alone with the impalpable Fortunio, to be waited upon by him in his retreat unknown to every one else, to be avenged in such splendid fashion of the hypocritical airs of compassion of Phœbe and Arabella ; and perhaps, — though she scarcely dared to allow her mind to dwell upon the delightful and voluptuous thought, — to lay her head upon that handsome, solid, white chest and entwine her arms around that round, fair neck.

F O R T U N I O

Fortunio was most attentive to her, and he paid her with the lordly, almost regal air which came naturally to him, most exquisitely graceful and delicate compliments.

I wish I could report their brilliant conversation, but I cannot do so without manifesting unbearable vanity. As a conscientious novelist, I have invented so perfect a hero that I am afraid to make use of him. I feel much the same embarrassment, si parva licet componere magnis, as did Milton when he had to make the Almighty speak in that wonderful poem, “Paradise Lost.” I can find nothing fine or splendid enough for my purpose. The course of my narration, besides, compels me to use expressions like this: "At this witty remark of Fortunio's, a lovely smile lighted up Musidora's face." The remark must necessarily be witty, or at least appear to be so, which is a difficult matter. There is another very unpleasant situation for an author who is gifted with any modesty: it is when the hero recites a piece of verse which deeply impresses the hearers, who exclaim at the end of each stanza, "Wonderful! sublime! splendid! excellent!" For myself, as I am shy, I shall gladly turn to account the convenient method of the old painters who, when they did not know how to draw something, or found it too difficult to depict, wrote in its place, "Currus venustus," or "Pulcher homo," according as it was a man or a carriage.

FORTUNIO

The repast had long been finished, the table had disappeared through the trap like a perjured wretch in the opera, and Fortunio, seated upon the divan, passed his hand through the waves of Musidora's fair hair. Her head, bowed by love, sank like a flower full of dew; her whole body trembled spasmodically; her heaving breast rose and fell beneath her dress; her arms fell limp, she seemed about to faint. Fortunio bent towards her, and their lips met in a delicious, endless kiss.

FORTUNIO

XVII

MUSIDORA had not breathed a word of her love to Fortunio. That was a great mistake. She ought to have made endless speeches and indulged in the most transcendental metaphysics of sentiment. I should have found a fine opportunity for showing that "her heart was admirably formed for love," and I could have filled quite a comfortable number of pages; but the truth is that she said nothing, and being a fantastic novelist, truth is too sacred to allow me to invent a single sentence.

Her eyes, filled with a moist light, her heaving bosom, her trembling voice, a sudden paleness swiftly followed by a sudden flush, told of the state of her soul much more eloquently than the most brilliant verses could have done, and Fortunio's mute kiss was in its way a perfect reply. Besides, you know very well that people talk only when they have nothing to say.

Perhaps it will be thought that Musidora yielded very quickly to Fortunio, for this was only the second time that she had met him; but I must remind you on her behalf that Musidora did not profess to be vir-tuous,—and then, by way of apophthegm, that love is prodigal, and that to love is to give. So Musidora attacked Fortunio's heart by voluptuousness, which is an excellent plan.

FORTUNIO

I shall turn to account the moments during which my two chief characters forget the world, to say something about my hero; for every writer's duty is to unravel for his reader the skein which he has unravelled at will, and to clear away the mysterious clouds which he has brought together himself at the very beginning of his work, so that the end might not be too early perceived.

Fortunio is a young nobleman of the highest aristocracy, just as much an aristocrat as a king, and as good a nobleman. The Marquis Fortunio, his father, whose fortune was impaired, had sent him, still very young, to India, to one of his uncles (pray forgive the uncle!), a nabob of colossal and titanic wealth. Fortunio's youth was spent in hunting tigers and elephants, in being carried in palanquins, drinking arrack, chewing betel, and watching, seated upon a Persian carpet, dancing-girls with golden anklets on their little feet, and their breasts enclosed in sheaths of scented wood. His uncle, a clever, voluptuous old man, who had his own ideas as to the education of children, had allowed Fortunio's character to develop freely ; being desirous, he said, to see how a child would turn out if he were never repressed and enjoyed the fullest opportunities of having his own way. His own inexhaustible fortune afforded him every facility for carrying out this plan of education, and his nephew never had any caprice which had not at once been satisfied. He never spoke to the lad of morals or religion ; he did not terrify him with thoughts of God, the devil, or even the statute law, — for laws do not exist for a man who has twenty millions a year. He allowed this vigorous human plant to shoot out right and left its strong branches laden with wild perfume. He cut off nothing, not a knot, not a single contorted branch ; on the other hand, he did not destroy a single leaf or a single flower.

FORTUNIO

Fortunio remained such as God had made him. Never did an unsatisfied desire sink back into his heart to gnaw it with its rat-like teeth. His passions, always gratified, left not a mark, not a wrinkle on his brow ; he was gentle, calm, and strong like a god, whose exterminating power he almost possessed. Young, handsome, vigorous, rich, witty, there was no one on earth whom he could envy, and he felt himself envied by all. He did not even have to desire the beauty of women, for his mistresses willingly confessed that they were inferior to him in the inimitable perfection of form.

FORTUNIO

At fifteen years of age he had a seraglio of five hundred slaves of all races to serve him, and as many lacs of rupees as he could spend. His uncle's treasury was open to him, and he drew heavily upon it. Never did care of the future or of his fortune shadow his fair brow with its bat-like wings. He lived careless in a golden atmosphere, never supposing that it could be otherwise. Great was his surprise when he discovered that there were actually people who did not have three hundred thousand a year. Like all spoiled children, Fortunio became a superior man. He had his faults and also his qualities. Ordinary teachers will not admit that a mountain pre-supposes a valley, a tower a well, and anything which shines in the sun a deep dark excavation from which it has been drawn.

There is nothing more detestable in this world than a man smoothed and planed like a board, incapable of running the risk of being hanged, and who has not in him the stuff for a crime or two.

FORTUNIO

Fortunio was capable of everything, for good as well as for evil, but his position was such that he had no need to do harm. From the height of his wealth he beheld men so small that he did not trouble with them. The black swarm of wretches crawling about his feet and labouring for a year to earn with difficulty as much gold as he spent in a month, did not appear to him worthy of the attention of a well-born man. He did not understand charity or philanthropy, but his caprices caused an abundant shower of gold to rain constantly around him, and all who lived in his shadow soon became rich. In fine, he did more good than thirty thousand virtuous men who distribute cheap soup. He was beneficent after the fashion of the sun, which, without giving a cent to anybody, gives life and riches to the whole world.

As he had never had any teacher, he knew a great many things and knew them thoroughly, having learned them alone. Being placed very high and not estopped by any prejudice of birth or position, he was broad-minded and far-seeing. If he had chosen to be an emperor or a king, he could have been one. Nothing would have been easier, with his boldness, his intelligence, his beauty, his knowledge of men, and his tremendous means of corruption. Through carelessness and disdain he left potentates in peace on their thrones, satisfied with being an actual king.

FORTUNIO

A distinctive feature of Fortunio's character was that, capable of everything, he was in no wise disillusioned; he estimated nothing above its proper value, but he did not systematically despise anything. As all his desires were fulfilled almost as soon as they were formed, he did not experience the fatigue caused by the attraction of the soul towards an object which it cannot reach; for it is not enjoyment that wears men out, but desire. He loved wine, good cheer, horses, and women, just as if he had never had any of them. Whatever was beautiful, splendid, and radiant pleased him. He understood equally well the beauty of a hut with its vine-clad door, its roof with brown, velvety moss strewn with wild flowers, and the magnificence of a marble palace with its fluted columns and its attic studded with endless white statues. He admired equally art and nature; he was passionately fond of red-haired women, which did not prevent his being entirely satisfied with negresses and coloured girls. Spanish women charmed him, but he adored English women, and did not disdain Hindoos; even French women struck him as very agreeable. He had also a marked taste for Raphael's Madonnas and Titian's courtesans. In a word, he was an eclectic of the very first water, and no one ever carried cosmopolitanism farther than he. And yet, — I confess it to his shame, or his praise, — he was never known to have a regular mistress, and no one ever knew that he had a regular domicile. As for his slaves, black, yellow, or red, they were thrashed as often as the Scapins of comedy or the Daves in Plautus' plays. Strangely enough, he was worshipped by his servants, who would have gone through fire and water to please him. He treated them so much like brutes that he had made them believe they were dogs, and had inspired them with the loving servility of that animal. Never did he have to repeat an order. Indeed, he rarely took the trouble to express his will by words; a gesture, a glance was sufficient.

FORTUNIO

He had always in his carriage-house a carriage and pair ready harnessed, and two horses saddled and bridled; a dinner was constantly held prepared in the pantry; Fortunio had never yet had to wait for any one or anything. Obstacles and delays were unknown to him. He did not know what to-morrow meant; in his case everything could be to-day ; he was able to turn the future into the present.

FORTUNIO

When his uncle died, he was about twenty, and he felt the wish to see Europe, France, Paris ; so he came, bringing with him twenty fortunes, tons of gold, coffers of diamonds, etc.

At first, accustomed as he was to Oriental splendour, everything struck him as mean, wretched, and small. The richest noblemen seemed to him like ragged beggars. Yet he very soon discovered, under the mean and dull aspect, a whole world of ideas the very existence of which he had not hitherto suspected. In this world he made the most rapid progress, and was soon as much at home in it as a thorough-bred Parisian, thanks to his admirable natural instinct. It delighted him, after having tasted the deep, wild charm of barbaric life, to enjoy the refinements of the highest civilisation ; after having hunted tigers on an elephant's back with Malays in the Javanese jungles he liked to go hunting in company with members of Parliament, mounted on a half-bred hunter and sporting pink ; after having dressed in muslin, and, seated cross-legged on a mat of perfumed reeds in the shadow of the great pagoda at Benares, watching the genuine bayaderes, it amused him to watch at the Opera, holding his glasses in his yellow kid-gloved hands, Mademoiselle Taglioni in "The God and the Bayadere." Only at first he had found it very difficult to keep from beheading the people who bored him.

FORTUNIO

The only thing to which his Eastern habits could not conform was to see his house open to everybody, and bold pirates insinuate themselves into the secret recesses of his life under the guise of intimate friends. He met his companions in pleasure in society, at the theatre, out driving, but no one had set foot in his home. If he could not help entertaining them, he did so in some apartment engaged for the purpose, and which he immediately left for fear they should return to it.

His life was divided into two very complete parts : the one entirely external, with steeplechases, joyous suppers, and follies of all kinds ; the other mysterious, apart, and absolutely unknown.

Fortunio had been told once that he had had neither a duchess nor an opera dancer, and that he needed these to be entirely in the fashion ; whereto he replied that he looked upon the former as too old and the latter as too thin : nevertheless he was seen the next day at the Bouffes with an opera dancer, and the day after that with a duchess. The dancer was plump and the duchess young, which was doubly extraordinary. Having made this sacrifice to conventionalities, Fortunio resumed his usual way of life, appearing and disappearing without ever saying where he went or whence he came. His companions' curiosity had at first been excited to the highest degree, but little by little it had been dulled, and Fortunio had been taken for what he chose to represent himself.

FORTUNIO

Musidora's love had awakened the desire to penetrate the mystery of his life, and his eccentricities were more than ever talked about, yet every one was compelled to be satisfied with vague conjectures; the real truth was unknown; George himself knew of Fortunio only what related to his life in India. I have myself nothing more particular to tell my reader about him; nevertheless I hope soon to track him into his secret retreat.

XVIII

THE victoria with the dapple-gray horses returned empty to Musidora's house, to the great astonishment of Jacintha, Jack, and Zamora. Musidora the dove-like had chosen for that night the nest of Fortunio the eagle.

FORTUNIO

A rosy red sunbeam struck through the curtains of a sumptuous bed with spiral columns surmounted by a carved frieze. Like a bee hesitating before it alights on a flower, it quivered on Musidora's lips, asleep with her hair loose and her arms gracefully rounded above her head. Fortunio, leaning on his elbow, was watching with melancholy attention the young girl overshadowed by the angel of sleep. Her pure and delicate form showed in all its perfection. Her skin, fine and satiny like a camellia leaf, slightly flushed here and there by a fold of the sheet or the mark of a burning kiss, shone in the warm moisture of repose. One tress of her hair, passed between her neck and her arm, fell upon her breast which it seemed to seek to bite like Cleopatra's asp. At the foot of the bed one of her white dimpled feet, the nails polished like agate, the heel rosy, the ankle of the daintiest, emerged from under the coverlet; the other, drawn back, could be vaguely made out under the many folds. The tawny, golden complexion of Fortunio contrasted happily with the ideal fairness of Musidora. It was like a Giorgione by the side of a Lawrence, like yellow Italian amber by the side of blue-veined English alabaster, and it would have been difficult to say which was the more lovely of the pair.

FORTUNIO

Fortunio's practised eye analysed the beauties of his mistress with the double gaze of a lover and an artist. He was as much of a connoisseur in women as in statues and horses, which is saying not a little. Apparently he was satisfied with his examination, for a smile of content hovered over his lips; he bent over Musidora, and kissed her softly lest he should wake her. Then he resumed his silent contemplation.

"She is very beautiful," he murmured, "but decidedly I prefer Soudja-Sari, my Javanese girl. I shall go and see her to-morrow."

"Did you not speak, my dear lord?" said Musidora, raising her long lashes.

"No, queenlet," replied Fortunio, pressing her in his arms.

XIX

HERE I am sunk in perplexity again. I had managed to discover the origin of Fortunio's wealth; I had obtained fairly satisfactory information concerning the manner in which he was brought up, his mode of life, his views on morality and philosophy ; in spite of all his cleverness in concealing himself and his Protean skill in avoiding curiosity, I had managed to lay my hand on him and to penetrate into one of his retreats, — perhaps even his chief retreat ; and now all my trouble is lost. I have to set out again and seek in every direction for the solution of this new mystery. What accursed idea induced that confounded Fortunio to utter by Musidora's side so incongruous a name as Soudja-Sari ? Evidently my feminine readers will want to know who is Soudja-Sari the Javanese girl. Is she a mistress whom Fortunio had in India, the woman to whom was addressed the Malay pantoun found in the stolen pocket-book and translated by the date-selling rajah ? I cannot answer this important question. It is the first time that I have heard the name of Soudja-Sari ; she is as much a stranger to me as the Great Khan of Tartary, and I confess that this remembrance of Fortunio's is entirely out of place. Does he not possess Musidora, a lovely creature, a peerless pearl, whose soul, regenerated by love, is as beautiful as its frame, a supreme effort of nature to prove its power, the most suave, delicate, perfect, and finished creature imaginable ? Is not that enough for a novel, and am I to favour my libertine hero so far as to grant him two mistresses at once? It would be far better to give six lovers to Musidora than two mistresses to Fortunio; women would forgive me more easily, though Heaven knows why. Yet I shall do my best to satisfy the curiosity of the ladies.

FORTUNIO

FORTUNIO

Soudja-Sari is not a former mistress of Fortunio's, since he has just said that he means to go to see her to-morrow. Where is he going to see her? It cannot be in Java, for there is no railway yet between Paris and Java, and even did Fortunio possess the wand of Abaris, he could not make the trip between evening and morning; and he promised Musidora to accompany her to the Opera at the next performance. Soudja-Sari, therefore, must be in Paris or its suburbs, but in what part? Is it in the Cité Bergère, where dwell the houris, or the Faubourg Saint-Germain? At Saint-Maur or at Auteuil? Hic jacet lepus, — that is the question.

I must be content with telling you that Soudja-Sari means "The Languorous Eye," in accordance with Eastern custom which gives women names drawn from their physical peculiarities. Thanks to the translation of this significant name, which I owe to the kindness of a member of the Asiatic Society deeply versed in Javanese, Malay, and other Indian tongues, we now know that Soudja-Sari is a beautiful girl with a voluptuous eye, with a velvety, dreamy look. Which shall win, Soudja-Sari's jet-like eyes or Musidora's sea-green eyes?

FORTUNIO

XX

FORTUNIO's house plunged into the river on one side. A white marble staircase, some of the steps of which were above or under water according to the abundance of rain or the heat of the sun, led from Fortunio's room to a little gilded, painted boat covered with a silk awning.

Fortunio proposed to take a turn on the river before breakfast. Musidora agreed. She sat down under the awning on a pile of cushions; Fortunio lay down at her feet, smoking his hookah, and four negroes dressed in red jackets sent the boat gliding along like a kingfisher that cuts the water with its wing. Musidora plunged her slender hand in Fortunio's black, silky hair with ineffable delight. At last she had him, that long-wished-for Fortunio, seated at her feet, his head resting in her lap; she had eaten at his table, lain in his bed, slept in his arms. At one step she had penetrated into that unknown life so difficult to enter; she possessed the man she loved, she who had been possessed by men she hated. She experienced that total forgetfulness of everything which comes of true love, and allowed herself to be carelessly borne away on the swift current of passion. Her previous life was entirely effaced; she lived only since the night before, she had begun to live only from the day when she had seen Fortunio.

FORTUNIO

Her only fear was lest her life should not be long enough to prove her love for him. Ten years, the longest time which one dare venture to suggest for a liaison, appeared to her very short. She would have liked to preserve her dear passion beyond the tomb: she who had hitherto had been more atheistical than Voltaire himself believed firmly in the immortality of the soul, in order to indulge the hope of loving Fortunio to all eternity.

The boat glided swiftly over the calm surface of the river; the four sweeps of the rowers did not splash, and the one sound heard was the ripple of the water that rushed past the boat in foamy waves. Fortunio dropped his hookah, took Musidora's two feet, placed them on his chest as on an ivory foot-stool, and began to whistle carelessly a quaint and melancholy air. The shadows of the poplars on the bank fell upon the boat, which seemed to float in a sea of foliage. Limp-waisted dragon-flies flew under the awning in the transparent whirlwind of their gauzy wings, and gazed at our two lovers with their emerald eyes. A silver-bellied fish leaped here and there and marked the oily surface of the water with a passing gleam of light. There was not a breath of air; the light tops of the reeds were motionless, and the boat's ensign fell into the water in soft, heavy folds. The sky, filled with light, was silvery gray, for the intense noonday sun had killed the blue, and on the edge of the horizon rose a warm dun-coloured mist like that of the Egyptian skies.

FORTUNIO

“By Jove!” said Fortunio, throwing off the white cashmere burnoose which he wore, “I have a great mind to bathe;” and he sprang from the gunwale of the boat.

Although Musidora was a swimmer, she could not repress an emotion of terror on seeing the water boil as it closed over Fortunio's head, but he soon reappeared, shaking his long hair, which dropped on his shoulders. Fortunio swam as well as the finest and most elegant Triton in Neptune's court; the fishes themselves would not have had much chance against him. He was beautiful to look at. His handsome shoulders, firm and polished, and pearly with drops of water, shone like submerged marble; the amorous wave shimmered with pleasure as it touched his fair body, and suspended silver pearls from his arms. The aquatic plants, which he had put into his hair, set off its bright lustrous black with their pale, glaucous green. He might have been taken for the god of the river in person.

FORTUNIO

Musidora could not sufficiently admire that beauty superior to the perfection of the loveliest of women. Neither Phœbus Apollo, the young, radiant god, nor Scamander fatal to virgins, nor Endymion the pale lover of the moon,—none of the ideal forms realised by sculptors or poets could have borne comparison with my hero. He was the last type of manly beauty, which has disappeared from the world since the new era. Phidias himself, or Lysippus, Alexander's sculptor, could not have dreamed of a more pure and more perfect form.

“Why do you not bathe?” said Fortunio to Musidora, as he drew near the boat. “I have been told that you can swim, little one.”

“Yes, but those negroes?”

FORTUNIO

“Those negroes! — what do they matter? Besides, they are not men, they are mutes.”

So Musidora undid her dress and slipped into the river. Her long hair floated behind her like a golden mantle, and from time to time her satiny back showed on the surface of the water like the back of a Rubens nymph, and her little heels as rosy as the fingers of dawn. Fortunio and she swam side by side like twin swans, and after describing some graceful curves to break the force of the current, they returned to their point of departure and set foot on the lower steps of the marble stair.

Two handsome mulatto girls awaited them with great wrappers of soft, warm stuff, in which they enveloped themselves.

“Well, my fair naiad,” said Fortunio, draped in his wrapper; “do we not look like two antique statues? I am a passable Triton; and the fresh water need no longer envy the salt, — a Venus has arisen from it who is at least as good as the other. Why is there not a Phidias on the shore? The modern world would then have its Venus Anadyomene. But our sculptors are fit only to cut paving-stones or to make deities of illustrious men in frock coats. With this accursed civilisation, which has no other object than to stick up on a pedestal the aristocracy of cobblers and candle-makers, the feeling for form is being lost; and God will one of these mornings be obliged to get out of his Voltairean arm-chair to make the world over, for it has been destroyed by the numberless cads who hate all splendour and all beauty, and who constitute modern nations. A people which was even slightly civilised, in the true sense of the word, would erect a temple and statue to you, my queenlet; they would make a goddess of you,—the goddess Musidora. That would not sound so badly.”

FORTUNIO

“Married to the god Fortunio, both before the mayor and in the Church of Olympus; else the somewhat prudish divinities would refuse to receive me at their Wednesday or Friday evenings,” replied Musidora, laughing.

Chatting thus, the two lovers re-entered the house.

But what of Soudja-Sari? My curious, fair reader, I shall soon tell you something of her.

XXI

THE day passed like a lovely dream. Our two lovers enjoyed deeply each other's beauty, and their rosy lips were the charming cups in which they drank the heady wine of voluptuousness. They kissed but once, but that kiss lasted until night. Musidora laid her burning, velvety cheek against Fortunio's cool breast. She was drawn up on herself in an adorably infantile attitude, like a child that settles in its mother's lap to sleep at ease. She closed her eyes, the lashes of which came down to the middle of her cheeks; then she raised them slowly to look at Fortunio.

FORTUNIO

"Ah!" she said, after a mute contemplation, and pressing him to her breast with superhuman strength, "the day you cease to love me, I shall kill you."

"Good!" said Fortunio to himself, "this is the one hundred and fifty-third woman who has said the same thing, and I am still in pretty fair health. It will not prevent my enjoying life."

He felt the soft girdle which Musidora had bound around his body suddenly relax. He looked at her and saw her pale,—her head thrown back nervously, her teeth clenched, her lips colourless, as if she were plunged in a paroxysm of rage.

"The devil!" said Fortunio. "Can she be serious? These little, delicate, frail demons are capable of anything. This promises to be amusing. After all, it is a pretty death, I do not care for any other. No one yet has loved me enough to kill me. It would be rather strange if, after having weathered all the storms of Indian and tropical passions, I should have my throat neatly cut by a fair, clean little Parisian who is just about strong enough to fight a duel with an insect."

FORTUNIO

"In that case, my queen," he said aloud, "you have just signed my warrant for eternal life. I shall grow older than Methuselah and Melchisedec."

"So you will always love me?" said Musidora, with a long and voluptuous kiss.

"Assuredly. When one loves, it is forever, otherwise what is the good of loving? Does not the infinite involve eternity. I shall adore you in this world and in the next, if there be one, and there must be one expressly for that purpose. Love has scores of eternities at its disposal."

"Oh, you wicked railer, who believe in nothing!" said Musidora with a charming pout.

"I? I believe in everything. I believe in the charity of philanthropists, in the virtue of women, in the good faith of journalists, in the epitaphs on tombstones,—in everything which is most unbelievable.

FORTUNIO

I wish there could be four persons in the Trinity so that my faith might be more meritorious."

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself, sir; you are an atheist, which is very bad form," answered Musidora, playing with the amulet that sparkled on Fortunio's neck.

"An atheist? Nay, I have three gods: gold, beauty, and happiness. I am at least as pious as pious Æneas of blessed memory."

"Then believe in God; it can do no harm, as old women say when they propose a remedy for headache or toothache."

"Now, look here, heart of mine, are we going to talk theology? I would rather dine and take you to the Opera. I have got to present you to the world. Let us sit down to table and then go."

"How can I go, dressed like this, Fortunio?"

"We will call at your house, and you can put on another gown."

After the dinner, which was no less sumptuous than heretofore, the handsome couple got into the carriage. Musidora stopped at her house and put on a lovely dress. Through a childish caprice, she wore white from head to foot like a young bride. The sweet, virginal expression of her face, illumined by deep internal felicity, admirably harmonised with her dress.

FORTUNIO

Fortunio, divining the intention which had suggested the choice of the dress, drew from a small box of red morocco which he had in his pocket, a necklace of perfectly round pearls, and earrings and bracelets, also of pearls, of inestimable value.

“This is my wedding present, Marchioness. You must put on the earrings and bracelets and the necklace. And now, my Infanta, you are perfect, and I will wager that to-night twenty women burst with jealousy. You will cause many a jaundice, and more than one lover will be treated like a negro in consequence of the ill-temper which you will certainly excite in the feminine camp.”

When Musidora appeared in her box with Fortunio, a wave of admiration swept through the hall and the audience very nearly broke out into applause. Phœbe, who was in a stage-box with Alfred, turned as pale as the moon when rises the sun; the skin of Arabella, who was after Fortunio's heart, was marked with yellow lines as if her gall had burst, and the violence of her emotion was so great that she nearly fainted.

FORTUNIO

As for Cynthia the Roman, she smiled gently, and between the acts came with Phœbe to call on Musidora.

“You are so like a bride that you might be taken for one,” said Phœbe with a constrained look and a venomous smile.

“I am,” said Musidora, “for yesterday I was married to the dream of my heart.”

“I thought so,” said Cynthia. “Never did a novena with a three-pound candle fail to produce its effect. My Madonna is worth a great deal more than all your rough, bearded saints.”

“Madam,” said George, who entered the box; “permit me to present my respects to you, if there is any room for them. The carriage is yours. When am I to send it to you?”

“Thank you, George, Fortunio has forestalled you.”

“Well, Fortunio,” went on George, “have you just come back from Calcutta or from hell? Perhaps it was there that Musidora met you. She is on excellent terms with the devil.”

“No, I have come back in the most commonplace way from Neuilly, like a constitutional monarch. Have you had Cynthia framed?”

FORTUNIO

The Roman girl made a silent negative sign. Phœbe, bending by Fortunio's ear, informed him that Cynthia was in love with a sort of bravo, half swashbuckler, half fencing-master, six feet tall, with black whiskers and three rows of teeth like a crocodile, and that she wasted all her money upon him.

"Just like her," whispered Fortunio.

While this conversation was going on in Fortunio's box, Alfred, left alone, was gazing at Musidora through his glasses.

"Decidedly," he said to himself, "I shall begin to pay court to Musidora,—Phœbe is too cold. It would be in the best of taste to supplant Fortunio, with his fine, satrap-like airs. It would be a brilliant deed, and would restore my reputation as a lady-killer, which needs to be revived, for I cannot conceal from myself the fact that I have missed three women. How the devil can Fortunio meet all the expenses he indulges in? There is something queer about it. He is not known to own a single foot of land. Strange! very strange! excessively strange indeed! But I shall fathom the mystery, and I shall possess Musidora."

Alfred, having come to this praiseworthy decision, felt much satisfied with himself, and repeatedly passed his white-gloved hand through his curled hair with the most satisfied and victorious look in the world.

FORTUNIO

XXII

FORTUNIO had allowed himself to share Musidora's passion. True love is as contagious as the plague. Scoffer and sceptic though he appeared to be, he did not suffer from the hardness of heart which is the result of too precocious and too easy enjoyment. He hated worse than death the grimaces of sensibility, and could not be seduced by mincing airs; hypocrisy in love revolted him more than any other. On the other hand, he was touched by the least mark of true affection and would not have treated harshly a ragged beggar or a mangy dog that exhibited real affection for him. Although his vast wealth made it easy for him to obtain possession of all brilliant and splendid realities, the little blue flower of artless love softly bloomed in a corner of his heart. A seraglio of two hundred women and the favours of all the handsome courtesans of the world had in no wise caused him to become blasé. He was more of a roué than an octogenarian diplomat, yet more candid than Cherubino at his godmother's feet. He would have led the life of a Don Juan, yet have enjoyed walking with a boarding-school girl, and wearing an apple-green satin vest on the banks of the Lignon. He calmly yielded to the strangest contradictions and cared nothing at all for logic. His passions led him where they chose, without his ever attempting to resist them. He was good in the morning and wicked at night, and oftener good than wicked, for he was in sound health. He was handsome and rich, and naturally inclined to consider the world well ordered; but unquestionably, whatever his temper might be, he was what he seemed to be. He could perfectly well understand the most opposite things; he was equally fond of scarlet and of sky-blue, but he hated the phraseology of novels and fashionable jargon, and what had chiefly captivated him in Musidora was that she had given herself to him without a word.

FORTUNIO

Society talked of nothing but the victory won by Musidora over the shy and reserved Fortunio, who had become so singularly tame. The little, green-eyed Parisian kitten had mastered the Indian tiger; she had caged him in her love, the imperceptible wires of which were more solid than iron bars. She seemed to have completely fascinated him, and poor Soudja-Sari must have been greatly neglected; Musidora's tenderness triumphed over her beauty. Fortunio behaved with her more as a European than he had done with any other woman since his arrival in France. He went to see her every day, and spent sometimes whole weeks without leaving her. Fortunio the Sultan had assumed the manners of Amadis; a princess could not have been adored more profoundly nor respected more humbly, yet occasionally he had very marked fits of relapses into Asiatic ferocity; the tiger's claws showed sharp and menacing from out the velvet of his paws.

FORTUNIO

One night when he was with her an extraordinary idea came into his mind. He rose, dressed, took the lamp, which he placed near the fringes of the curtains, and set fire to them with the greatest coolness; then he entered the next room and did the same there. The great tongues of flame were already blackening the ceiling, and a dazzling light penetrated the sleeping eyes of Musidora. She awoke, and seeing her room full of fire and smoke, uttered a cry of terror.

“Fortunio! Fortunio! save me!”

Fortunio was standing quietly leaning against the mantel-piece, watching the progress of the fire with an air of satisfaction.

“I am stifling!” said Musidora, springing from the bed and running to the door. "But what are you doing, Fortunio, and why don't you call for help?"

FORTUNIO

"It is too late," replied he; and taking up Musidora like a little child, he rolled her up in a blanket and carried her away.

The unbearable, suffocating heat would have made the passage through the suite of rooms which composed the apartment difficult and perilous to a man less agile and less vigorous than Fortunio. In a few bounds he reached the last door, went down the stairs with the swiftness of a bird, opened the outer door for himself, for it would have taken too long to waken the porter buried in drunkenness and sleep, and entered with his precious burden a carriage that seemed to be awaiting him. He sat down, placed Musidora on his knee, and the carriage drove off.

The flames had broken through the windows, and the smoke poured out in dense clouds; the whole household was at last awake, and cries of "Fire!" repeated in every key, were heard from one end of the street to the other. Sparks flew up and scintillated like golden spangles against the red background of the conflagration. It looked like a magnificent aurora borealis.

FORTUNIO

"I wager Jack will not wake until he is quite cooked," said Fortunio, laughing.

Musidora did not reply. She had fainted.

XXIII

WHEN she regained her senses, she found herself lying on a bed at once elegant and simple. Fortunio was seated by her side.

The interior of the room was most charming and coquettish. The furniture betokened an exquisite taste. It was not that regal and almost insolent luxury which dazzles more than it charms, but a sweet, chastely diaphanous luxury which satisfied the soul even more than the eye. The upholsterer who had designed the room must have been a great poet: it was Fortunio.

"What do you think of this little nest? Is it to your taste?"

"Quite," replied Musidora; "but to whom does this house belong? Where am I?"

"That is a foolish question. You are at home."

"At home!" said Musidora, astonished.

"Yes, I bought this house, for I intended to burn yours," replied Fortunio carelessly, as if he had said the most natural thing in the world.

FORTUNIO

"What! It was you who set fire to my house?"

"I wisely considered that the fire would not break out of itself, so I set it."

"Are you mad, Fortunio, or making fun of me?"

"Neither. Have I said anything nonsensical? The architecture of your building was of the Doric order, which is particularly abhorrent to me, — and then —"

"And then what? That is a nice reason to set fire to a whole quarter perhaps," said Musidora, seeing that Fortunio had stopped in the middle of his sentence.

"And then," went on Fortunio, whose complexion had assumed a greenish tinge, and whose eyes had lighted up. "I would not see you longer in a house which had been given you by another and where others had possessed you. It made me ill; I hated every arm-chair, every piece of furniture as if it had been my mortal foe, for in each I saw a kiss or a caress. I could have stabbed your sofa as if it had been a man. Your rings, your dresses, your gems, produced on me the same cold and venomous sensation as the touch of a serpent's skin. Everything in your house recalled to me thoughts that I wanted to drive away forever ; but they returned more importunate and more obstinate than swarms of wasps, and drove into my heart their poisoned stings. You cannot imagine with what vengeful satisfaction I saw the flames lick up those impure draperies, which had before my day cast their perfidious, soft light upon so many voluptuous scenes. How madly the fire embraced the hated walls, and how well it seemed to share my fury! Honest fire, which purifies everything! Thy rain of sparks, of burning flame, fell upon me fresher than the dew of a May morning, and I felt the peace of my heart renewed as under a beneficent shower. Now there cannot be a single wall left standing; all has fallen or is ruined; there is nothing left but a mass of ashes and coals. I breathe more freely, I feel my breast dilate. But you still wear that wrapper, more odious than Dejanira's robe. I must tear it into a thousand pieces and trample it under foot as if it were living." And Fortunio tore off the wrapper, threw it upon the ground, and trampled upon it with the mad rage of a bull which tosses with its horns the scarlet banner abandoned by the chulos.

FORTUNIO

Musidora, terrified by this wild-beast-like madness, had curled herself up under her blanket, her arms crossed on her bosom, and awaited with mute anxiety the close of this strange scene.

FORTUNIO

“Ah! I should like to flay you alive,” said Fortunio, drawing near the bed.

The girl was terrified for a moment lest he should carry out his intention; but the young and ill-tamed jaguar continued thus:—

“Your soft, satin skin, on which your lovers’ lips, swollen by debauch, have been pressed,—I could tear it from your body with delight. I wish no one had ever seen you, touched you, or heard you; I could break the mirrors in which your image has been reflected for a few seconds. I am jealous of your father, for his blood is in your body, and flows freely through the lovely network of your veins; I am jealous of the air you breathe, and which seems to kiss you; of your shadow, which follows you like a tender lover. I must have your whole life, past, present, and future. I do not know why I refrain from killing George and de Marcilly, and having Willis dug up to throw his body to the dogs.”

While thus speaking, Fortunio roamed around the room like one of those lean wolves which may be seen in menageries moving around their cage and rubbing their black noses against the bars. He was silent, raged round the room a few times more, and then fell upon his face on the bed, weeping bitterly. The storm which had begun with thunder was turning into rain.

FORTUNIO

“You madman! How is it you do not feel that I have never loved any one but you,” said Musidora, taking his head and drawing it to her heart. “Oh, my beloved! I was born on the day I found you. My life dates from the day of our love. Why should you be jealous of Musidora? You know very well that she is dead. Are you not my god, my maker, have you not made me out of nothing? Why should you torment yourself?”

“Forgive me, my angel, I was brought up very close to the sun, in a land of fire. I go to extremes in everything, and my passions roar in my soul as lions in their dens. But it is striking three o’clock. Close your eyes, my little crocodile, — go to sleep, Miss.”

XXIV

I PROMISED my fair readers to discover Soudja-Sari, the Javanese beauty with the languorous eyes. As she now happens to be the oppressed heroine, since Fortunio loves Musidora, interest naturally is concentrated upon her. But it was rash of me to make a promise so difficult to fulfil. I have no means of finding Soudja-Sari other than to follow Fortunio, and how am I going to follow on foot a young fellow drawn by thorough-bred horses? And besides, have I the right to spy upon my hero? Is it decent to insinuate myself thus into the secrets of a well-bred man? Is it his fault that I have taken him for the hero of my tale? There are so many others who are glad enough to print their private correspondence.

FORTUNIO

Yet at any cost I must find Soudja-Sari, the beauty with the languorous eyes. I here renounce all the artifices usually employed by novelists to excite and create interest, and being warned, besides, that it will soon be time to write the glorious word "Finis," I proceed to betray Fortunio's secret.

As I have said, Fortunio was brought up in India by his uncle, a nabob enjoying untold wealth. After his uncle's death he came to France, bearing with him enough to purchase a kingdom. One of his greatest pleasures was to mingle barbaric and civilised life, to be at one and the same time a satrap and a dandy, Beau Brummel and Sardanapalus; he enjoyed having one foot in India and the other in France.

FORTUNIO

To carry out this double purpose, this is what he had done. He had purchased, in a very retired quarter of Paris, a whole block of houses, the centre of which was filled with great gardens. He had torn down all the inner buildings, and had left to his block of houses merely a thin crust of façades. All the windows looking upon the gardens had been carefully walled up, so that it was impossible to perceive from any side the buildings erected by Fortunio unless one passed overhead in the car of a balloon. Four houses, one at each corner of the block, served as entrances. Long, vaulted passages led to them and afforded communication with the outer world without exciting suspicion. Fortunio went out and came in sometimes through one, sometimes through another, so as not to be noticed. A dealer in provisions, the back of whose shop communicated with the buildings, and who was merely a devoted servant of Fortunio's, enabled provisions to be brought in in a natural and plausible manner.

It was in that unknown palace, more undiscoverable than El Dorado sought by Spanish adventurers, that Fortunio disappeared in the mysterious way which so greatly excited his friends' curiosity. There he spent a week, a fortnight or a month, as his fancy dictated, without showing outside. The workmen employed in erecting the building had been richly compensated for keeping the secret, but had been scattered in different parts of the globe; not one of them had been left in Paris. Fortunio had sent them off without their being aware of the fact, some to America, others to India and Africa; he had proposed to them wonderful opportunities of bettering their lot, which seemed to arise fortuitously and of which they had been completely the dupes.

FORTUNIO

El Dorado, the golden palace, as Fortunio baptised it, did not belie its name. Gold shone in it everywhere, and Nero's Golden House assuredly could not have been more magnificent.

Imagine a vast court surrounded by spiral columns of white marble with gilded capitals and shafts, entwined with a vine, also gilded, the grapes formed of rubies. Into this quadruple portico opened the exquisitely carved cedar doors of the apartments. From the centre of the court plunged down four porphyry stairs, with balustrades and landings, leading to a basin, the sparkling, deep water of which could be lowered to the lowest steps or raised to the level of the ground, according to the depth desired. The rest of the space was filled with orange-trees, tulip-trees, yellow-flowered angsokas, palms, aloes, and all manner of tropical plants growing in the open ground. In order to make this wonder intelligible, I add that El Dorado was a palace under glass. Fortunio, who was as chilly as a Hindoo, had, in order to secure an atmosphere such as he liked, first caused to be built a vast hot-house which completely enclosed his wondrous nest. A glass vault replaced the sky; and yet he did not lack rain on that account. When he wished to change the "set fair" of his crystalline atmosphere, he ordered rain, and rain at once fell. Invisible tubes full of holes poured down a shower of fine pearls upon the leaves, fan-shaped or quaintly cut, of his virgin forest.

FORTUNIO

Thousands of humming-birds and birds of paradise flew freely in the vast cage, shining in the air like winged, living flowers. Peacocks with lapis-lazuli necks and ruby aigrettes proudly dragged their starry tails over the sward.

A second court contained the lodgings of the slaves.

An inevitable disadvantage of the building was that it had no view. Fortunio, who had a very inventive mind and who was never put out by anything, had remedied this. The windows of his drawing-room looked out upon dioramas painted in marvellous fashion, and causing the most perfect illusion. One day it was Naples with its blue sea, its amphitheatre of white houses, its volcano crowned with flames, its golden, flowery islands; another day it was Venice, with the marble domes of San Giorgio, the Dogana, or the Ducal Palace; or else, if my Lord Fortunio happened to be in a pastoral mood, a Swiss view; but usually Asiatic prospects, Benares, Madras, Mazulipatam, and other picturesque places. His valet would enter his room in the morning and say, "What country will you have to-day, sir?"

FORTUNIO

"What have you ready?" Fortunio would answer. "Let me see the list."

The valet would hold out to Fortunio a mother-of-pearl notebook on which the names of the landscapes and cities were carefully engraved. Fortunio marked a view which he had not yet seen or which he desired to enjoy again, just as if he were ordering an ice.

He enjoyed life there like a rat in a Dutch cheese, indulging in all the refinements of Asiatic luxury, waited on by slaves on bended knee, adored like a god, beheading with a perfect dexterity, that would have done honour to a Turkish executioner, those who displeased him or served him awkwardly. The bodies were thrown into a well filled with quicklime and at once destroyed. But for some time past, no doubt influenced by European ideas, he had more rarely indulged in this sort of pleasure, unless he were drunk or sought to distract Soudja-Sari.

FORTUNIO

Before entering El Dorado he threw off his fashionable clothes and resumed his Indian dress: a gown and turban of gold-flowered muslin, slippers of yellow morocco, and a creese with diamond-studded handle.

None of the Hindoos, men or women, who were shut up in the splendid prison, knew a word of French, and they were all perfectly ignorant of the part of the world in which they happened to be. Neither Soudja-Sari, his favourite, nor Rima-Pahes, who draped herself in her long black hair as in a jet mantle, nor Koukong-Alis, with the rainbow-like eyebrows, nor Sicara with the flower-like mouth, nor Cambana, nor Keni-Tambouhan suspected that they were in Paris, for a very good reason,—they did not even know of the existence of that city. Thanks to this ignorance, Fortunio governed his little world as despotically as if he had been in the very depths of the Indies.

FORTUNIO

He would spend whole days in perfect immobility, seated upon a pile of cushions, his feet resting upon one of his women, following with a careless glance the blue spirals of smoke that rose from his hookah. He plunged with delight into the voluptuous state of stupor so dear to Orientals, and which is the greatest happiness that one can taste on earth, since it consists of perfect forgetfulness of all human affairs. Dreamy, vague reveries caressed his bent brow with the soft down of their wings; brilliant mirages shimmered before his half-closed eyes. From the broad calyx of the great Indian flowers, natural urns and scent-boxes, rose wild, penetrating perfumes, strong, bitter scents capable of intoxicating like wine or opium. Jets of rose water sprang as high as the carved lintels of the arcades, and fell in showers of spray within their rock-crystal basins with melodious murmur; to crown all this magnificence, the sun, illumining the glass vault, gave to the golden palace a diamond sky. It was the realisation of a fairy tale. Within it one was two thousand miles from Paris, in the recesses of the Orient, in the very depths of the "Thousand and One Nights;" and yet the muddy, vile, noisy street roared and swarmed within a few steps; the dim light of the lamp of the Commissary of Police swung from the end of a post in the fog ; the book-sellers sold the five Codes, with their edges of various colours ; the Constitutional Charter opened its tricoloured flowers in the shape of cockades ; the atmosphere of hydrogen gas and molasses characteristic of civilisation was breathed by passers-by who waded through a slough of muddiest roads. Noise, smoke, rain, ugliness, wretchedness, yellow faces under a gray sky, — in a word, the hideous, ignoble Paris which you all know.

FORTUNIO

But on the other side of the wall a little sparkling, warm, golden, harmonious, scented world ; a world of women, birds, and flowers ; an enchanted palace which Fortunio the wizard had known how to make invisible in the very centre of Paris, a city not favourable to prodigies ; a poet's dream carried out by a poetic millionaire, who is as rare as a millionaire poet, blooming like a marvellous flower of Arabian tales. On one side work, with its bare, blackened arms, its breast heaving like a blacksmith's bellows ; on the other, soft leisure carelessly leaning on its elbow ; delicate idlesse with its white, frail hands, recovering during the day from the fatigue of having slept all night ; the most perfect quietness by the side of the most feverish agitation ; a complete antithesis.

FORTUNIO

In this way did Fortunio lead a double life, enjoying both Asiatic and Parisian luxury. His mysterious retreat was a poetic nest where from time to time he indulged in his dreams. There were his only loves, for he could not put up with European manners and the constant mingling of the sexes. He was inclined to the opinion of the Sultan Schariar, that nothing was pleasanter than to buy a young maid and to have her beheaded after the first night. This simple plan prevented any possible treachery. He did not, however, carry his jealous precautions so far, though he felt it impossible to love any woman who had had another lover. Undoubtedly, if he had ever married, he would never have wedded a widow. Musidora was the only woman with whom he had carried on an intrigue so long ; he had yielded to the penetrating charm, to the transcendent coquetry, and especially to the true love of the girl. The warm flame of her passion had softened his heart ; he loved her, and yet he was unhappy for the first time in his life. Unbearable remembrances harried his soul, and in the midst of the sweetest kisses he tasted hideous bitterness : he always remembered that she had been possessed by others. His power for once failed him; he could not wipe away the former life of Musidora and purify her, and the thought clung to him like a vulture. He was so accustomed to exclusive possession that he found it difficult to understand that there were other men in the world besides himself. When anything reminded him that others could have been loved as he was, he entered into fiendish rages and would have torn lions in twain, so transported was he by fury. At such times he felt an irresistible need to mount on horseback, to leap into a crowd, and with great sword-cuts to slash off arms, legs, and heads. He uttered dreadful howls, and rolled on the ground like a madman. It was in one of these fits of jealous rage that he had set fire to Musidora's house. But for this, he was as impassible as an old Turk; had the lightning fallen and lighted his pipe, he would not have expressed the least surprise. He feared neither God nor devil, death nor life, and he was possessed of the finest coolness in the world.

FORTUNIO

Fortunio, spellbound by the enchanter Musidora, had appeared only at rare intervals in El Dorado; for nearly a week he had not set foot in it. A crushing weariness weighed down upon the glass sky of that little world the sun of which was hidden. As none of the inhabitants of El Dorado knew where he was, any conjectures as to the motives which kept him away were impossible. They did not know whether he was elephant hunting or making war against a rajah. Brought directly from India without having landed, they did not suppose that the manners of the country in which they were differed in any respect from the manners of Benares or Madras.

FORTUNIO

Soudja-Sari, restless and sad, lived withdrawn within her apartment with her women. It is to be regretted that none of our painters ever saw Soudja-Sari, for she was the daintiest and loveliest creature imaginable, and words, however well combined, give but an imperfect idea of a woman's beauty.

Soudja-Sari might have been thirteen years of age, though she seemed to be fifteen, so well formed was she and so delicately full were her contours. A single pale, warm tone spread from her brow to her feet; her skin, mat and pulpy like a camellia leaf, was softer to the touch than the internal membrane of an egg; certain transparent forms of amber could alone give an idea of her colour. It is difficult to imagine anything more piquant than the blond fairness of her virgin body covered with a thick mantle of hair as black as night, falling straight from her head to her heels. The roots of her hair, planted in the golden skin of her brow, formed a sort of charmingly quaint bluish penumbra. The long black eyes, rising slightly toward the temples, were full of inexpressible voluptuousness and languor, and the eyeballs passed from one side to the other with an irresistibly sweet, harmonious movement. Soudja-Sari was well named. When her velvet glance rested upon you, you felt in your heart an infinite idlesse, a calm full of freshness and perfume, a sort of joyful melancholy. The will yielded, projects vanished like smoke, and one desired only to remain forever lying at her feet; all things seemed useless and vain, and naught on earth worth doing save to love and sleep. Yet Soudja-Sari had violent passions, as violent as the perfumes and poisons of her native country.

FORTUNIO

Her fine, delicate nose, her blooming lips red like the cactus flower, her broad hips, her small feet and hands, — all marked her as thorough-bred and remarkably strong.

Fortunio had purchased her when she was nine years old, paying three oxen for her. She had had no difficulty in emerging from the crowd of beauties in his seraglio and becoming his favourite. Fortunio, no doubt, had not been faithful to her; that was impossible with his ideas and in view of Oriental manners, but he had always remained constant. Never until he had met Musidora had he felt for any one such quick and passionate desire, and the kitten with the sea-green eyes was the only woman that had ever rivalled Soudja-Sari's face in my hero's heart.

FORTUNIO

Seated on a carpet, Soudja-Sari was looking at herself in a little mirror made of specular iron with a handle of exquisitely chased gold. Four women, kneeling around her, were tressing her hair which they had divided among themselves, and in which they plaited golden threads. A fifth, seated farther away was gently tickling her back with a little hand of carved jade set at the end of an ivory wand.

Keni-Tambouhan and Koukong-Alis drew from cedarwood chests—the wardrobes of our princess—gowns and precious stuffs: black satins covered with fanciful flowers, the pistils formed of peacocks' aigrettes and the petals of butterflies' wings; brocades with grainy woof starred and dotted with luminous points; light velvets; silks more changeable than the neck of dove or the fire opal; muslins ribbed with gold and silver and ornamented with elegant designs, — the wardrobe of a fairy or a peri.

FORTUNIO

They spread all these splendours upon divans, so that Soudja-Sari may choose the robe she will wear that day. Rima-Pahes, whose long hair, tressed in Japanese fashion, is twisted around two golden pins with silver balls, kneels before Soudja-Sari and exhibits to her various gems contained in a small malachite coffer. But Soudja-Sari is uncertain; she does not know whether to take her chrysoberyl necklace or the azerodrach beads. She tries them in turn, and ends by choosing a small string of rose pearls, for which she soon substitutes three rows of coral. Then, as if worn out by so much labour, she leans back upon the knees of one of her women and lets fall her arms, the palms open, turned upwards, like a person worn out by lassitude. She closes her eyelids fringed with long lashes, and lets her head fall backwards. The four slaves, who have not yet finished tressing, draw near so as not to pull her hair, but one of them not having been quick enough, Soudja-Sari utters a cry more shrill than the hissing of an asp which has been trodden upon, and sits up with an abrupt, quick motion. The slave turns pale on seeing Soudja-Sari trying to draw from

FORTUNIO

Rima-Pahes' hair one of the long gold needles by which it is kept up; for one of the habits of the lady is to plant these pins in the breast of her women when they do not fulfil their functions with all desirable lightness. However, as the needle does not come out at once, Soudja-Sari resumes her nonchalant pose, and closes her eyes again. The slave breathes once more, and Soudja-Sari's toilet is completed without further incident.

This is how she was dressed: A pair of very full trousers, with black stripes on a tawny gold ground, fell from her hips to just above her ankles. A sort of jacket or very narrow waist, resembling the strophia and the cestus of antiquity, fastened top and bottom by two jewelled clasps, set off the rich contours of her round brown breasts, the upper portion of which was seen through the opening of the garment. This vest was of gold stuff with figures and flowers embroidered in gems; the foliage with emeralds, the roses with rubies, the blue flowers with turquoises. It was sleeveless, and showed the exquisite form of two lovely arms. The piquancy and singularity of this Javanese costume was due to there being quite a space between the bust and the girdle, so that her dimpled hips, more polished and shining than marble, and her supple loins, as shapely as those of a Greek statue of the finest period, were visible.

FORTUNIO

Her hair was divided, as I have said, in four long tresses twined with gold threads, which fell down to her feet, two in front and two behind; a camboja flower bloomed on either side of her polished, transparent temples, on which was a network of delicate veins similar to that on the temples of the portrait of Anne Boleyn, and on the tips of her pearly ears, exquisitely shaped, sparkled two scarabei, the golden-green wing-sheaths of which were coloured with all sorts of tints of unimaginable richness. A great scarf of Indian muslin, with a pattern of sprigs of flowers worked in gold, wound carelessly around her body, softened by its vapoury whiteness the over-brilliance of the costume. Her feet were bare, each toe covered with diamond rings, and her ankles adorned with golden anklets. On her arms she wore three bracelets, two close to the shoulder and the other on the wrist.

In case she wished to walk and to go down to the garden,—a fancy that rarely seized her,—there was placed by the side of a divan a pair of slippers wonderfully delicate and small, with the points curved inward after the Siamese fashion.

FORTUNIO

Having finished dressing, she called for a pipe and began to smoke opium. Rima-Pahes dropped with a silver needle upon the porcelain mushroom the pastille which had been liquified in the flame of scented wood, while Keni-Tambouhan softly waved two great fans of the feathers of the Argus pheasant, and the beautiful Cambana, seated upon the ground, sang, accompanying herself on a guzla with three cords, the pantoum of the dove of Patani and the vultures of Bendam.

The blue, aromatic smoke of the opium escaped in light puffs from Soudja-Sari's red lips as she sank deeper and deeper in the delightful forgetfulness of all things. Rima-Pahes had already renewed the pastille six times.

"More," said Soudja-Sari, in the imperious tone of a spoiled child who would be given the moon if it fancied it.

"No, mistress," replied Rima-Pahes; "you know very well that Fortunio has forbidden your smoking more than six pipes." And she went out, bearing with her the precious golden box that contained the voluptuous poison.

FORTUNIO

“You wicked Rima-Pahes, to take away my box of opium! I wanted to sleep until my Fortunio returned. At least I should see him in my dreams. What is the use of being awake and alive when he is absent? Never did he stay away hunting so long. What can have happened to him? Perhaps he has been bitten by a serpent or wounded by a tiger.”

“Not much!” said Fortunio, raising the portière. “It is I who bite serpents and wound tigers.”

At the sound of the well-known voice, Soudja-Sari rose from her divan and cast herself into Fortunio’s arms with a movement like that of a young fawn unexpectedly wakened. She passed her two hands around her lover’s neck and clung to his lips with the mad avidity of a traveller who has crossed the desert without quenching his thirst; she pressed him to her breast, wound around him like an adder; she seemed to desire to envelop him with her body at every point at once.

“Oh, my dear lord,” she said, seating herself on her knees; “if you only knew how much I have suffered during your absence! You bore away my heart with your last kiss, and you did not leave me yours, wicked man! I was as one dead, or sunk in sleep. My tears alone, falling in silent drops down my cheeks, proved that I still existed. When you are away, O Fortunio of my heart, it seems to me as though the sun had died out in the solitary heavens; the brightest light is as dark to me as the shadows of night; everything is solitary. You alone are light, motion, life! Without you nothing exists. Would I could melt and lose myself in your life! Would I could be you to possess you more entirely!"

FORTUNIO

"This young woman expresses herself very well in Hindustani. It is a pity she does not know French; she could write novels, and would be a very agreeable bluestocking," said Fortunio to himself, as he untied Soudja-Sari's tresses while playing with them.

"Will my gracious sultan take a sherbet, chew betel, or drink arrack punch? Would he prefer preserved Chinese ginger or a prepared nutmeg?" said the Javanese, raising her soft eyes to his face.

"Have everything brought in. I feel a regal desire to get horribly drunk. You, Keni-Tambouhan, shall play on the tympanon; you, Cambana, shall work your claws upon your pumpkin with the broom-handle stuck in it; and the whole of you shall make noise enough to deafen the devil. It is long since I have enjoyed myself. Rima-Pahes, while I sing and drink, shall tickle the sole of my feet with a peacock's feather; Fatme and Zuleika shall dance, and afterwards we shall have a fight between a lion and a tiger. Every one who is not dead drunk within two hours shall be beheaded or impaled, as he or she pleases. I have spoken."

FORTUNIO

A swarm of little black, red, yellow, and piebald slaves arrived, bearing silver platters on their fingertips and carved vases upon their heads. In three minutes everything was ready.

Each group of women had its table, or rather its carpet, covered with bowls filled with preserves. The service was carried on in Oriental fashion. From time to time Fortunio cast to these beauties dried fruit mixed with gold and silver almonds that contained some gem, and he laughed heartily at the efforts they made to seize them. Never did the eyes of the Greeks, who adored lovely forms, gaze upon more graceful athletes, or behold more beautiful bodies in more varied and happy attitudes. The groups were admirable in their arrangement, interlaced like adders, and supple as Proteus.

"Come!" said Fortunio to Koukong-Alis, "do not bite. Look at that little scorpion waving its claws!"

FORTUNIO

If you make Sacara cry again, I will have you hung by the hair. Come here, Sacara; instead of one silver almond, you shall have a handful."

Sacara, smiling through her tears, cast a glance of triumph at Koukong-Alis, who remained gloomy and sombre in her place. Fortunio filled the fold of her dress with the precious fruit, kissed her, and made her sit down by him on the divan.

The two almehs advanced, swaying their hips, and danced until they fell on the floor breathless and half dead. The lion and the tiger fought with such fierceness that there was very little left of the pair. Arrack and opium performed their work so well that no one kept his or her senses beyond the prescribed time. Fortunio fell asleep on Soudja-Sari's bosom.

Musidora waited for him all night, and slept but little.

XXV

It would seem that Fortunio was very comfortable in his gilded nest, for Musidora waited for him in vain for a week.

The cause of this sudden rupture was that Fortunio had recognised that there existed between Musidora and him an inexhaustible source of bitterness. He thought her charming, clever, entirely worthy of being loved, but he could not forget the past; his retrospective jealousy was always awake; he would have been miserable beyond conception without in the least contributing to Musidora's happiness. He had made the greatest efforts to overcome the ever-present thought, but it always sprang up more venomous and obstinate. Feeling that the very efforts he made to forget compelled him to remember, he preferred to give up the useless struggle. If he had loved Musidora less, he would have kept her; he loved her too much to allow a secret thought to exist between them. With his firm character, he soon came to an irrevocable decision. Musidora received a letter containing an annuity of twenty-five thousand livres, together with a lock of Fortunio's hair, and these words written in an unknown hand: —

FORTUNIO

“MADAM, — The Marquis Fortunio has just been killed in a duel. Remember him sometimes.”

“Oh!” said Musidora, “he did not come, — so he must have been dead. I had guessed it. But I shall not long survive him.” And without shedding a tear, she fetched the pocket-book in which was the poisoned needle that Fortunio had taken from her at the beginning of their loves, mistrusting her impulsive character, and which she had found forgotten at the bottom of a casket.

FORTUNIO

“It was a fatal omen, and chance was clear-sighted when it made me find an instrument of death where I looked only for love letters and a means of beginning a frivolous intrigue.”

With these words she kissed the lock of Fortunio's hair and pricked herself in the throat with the point of the needle. Her eyes closed, her rosy lips turned blue, a shudder shook her lovely frame. She was dead.

XXVI

“MY DEAR RADIN MANTRI,—I shall very shortly follow this letter. I return to India, which I shall probably never leave again.

“You may remember with what eagerness I desired to visit Europe, the country of civilisation, as it is called. Heaven forgive me! If I had known what it was, I should never have put myself out for it.

“At present I am in France, a wretched country, and in Paris, a mean city. It is difficult to enjoy one's self properly here. To begin with, it is always raining, and the sun only shines with a flannel vest and a cotton cap on, — it looks like an old fellow stiff with rheumatism. The trees have very small leaves, and only for three months. There is no hunting save rabbits, or at most, a few wretched wild boars, or wolves which have not the strength to devour a dozen peasants.

FORTUNIO

“The men are horribly ugly, and the women — oh! ah! The rich people, or at least, those who claim to be so, have not even a twenty-five-franc piece in their pocket, and if when out driving it occurs to them to back their carriage into a shop-window, or to run over a fool or two, they are obliged to leave their hat in pledge or to go and borrow money from one of their friends.

“There is a certain class of young fellows who are called fashionables. They lead the most curious life. The dress of the most elegant of them is not worth a thousand francs, and generally they are in debt for it. Their supreme refinement consists in wearing patent-leather boots and white gloves. A pair of boots costs forty francs, a pair of gloves from three to five francs, — marvellous luxury, is it not? Their clothes are made of cloth very like that worn by janitors, dealers in salads, and barristers; it is very difficult to tell a nobleman or a rich man's son from a teacher of writing in twenty-four lessons.

FORTUNIO

“ These gentlemen dine in two or three cafés which are approved by fashion, where everybody can go, and where you run the risk of being seated at the same table as a writer of bad vaudevilles or of newspaper articles who has just received his month's pay and proposes to make up for an eight-days' fast. The cafés are the worst eating-houses in the world. You cannot get anything in them. You call for a bison's hump or an elephant's foot, and the waiter looks at you amazed, as if you had said something extraordinary. Their turtle-soup rarely contains shells, and you cannot find in their cellars a single drop of genuine Tokay or Shiraz wine.

“ After dinner, these fashionables go to a place called the Opera, a sort of barracks of wood and canvas, with faded gilding, and daubs like painted paper, sufficiently fine to exhibit acrobatic monkeys and learned asses in. It is considered good taste to sit in one of the oblong boxes which are close to four big pillars in repulsive Corinthian style, and which are not even of marble. It is impossible to see anything from these boxes, and that is probably why they are more sought after than any others. I asked myself frequently what pleasure one experienced there. It seems that the amusement consists in watching the legs of the dancers. These legs are usually very poor and covered with stuffed tights. The rest of the time there is a great deal of noise which is called music. The play is always the same, and the lines are written by the worst poets to be found.

FORTUNIO

“When there is no opera, you walk about with a cigar on the boulevard, which is not two hundred yards long, has no shadow, no coolness, and where you tread upon your neighbour’s feet. Or else you go to a party.

“To go to a party is one of the most inexplicable pleasures of civilisation. This is it. You assemble four hundred people in a room where one hundred would be uncomfortable. The men are dressed in black like undertakers; the women wear the most astonishing costumes possible,—gauze, ribbons, ears of corn in imitation gold, the whole business worth some fifteen francs. Their dresses, which are pitilessly cut low, exhibit unspeakably wretched contours. Everybody remains standing, stuck against the wall; the women are seated separately. Nobody speaks to them excepting a few aged, bald, pot-bellied individuals. A piano, which is an execrable invention, piteously maunders in a corner, and the shrill singing of some famous singer rises from time to time above the low murmur of the assembly. Hostlers and porters disguised as lackeys bring in a few cakes and glasses of tasteless mixtures, at which everybody dashes with disgusting avidity. The people who are best off dance themselves, as if they could not afford to pay for dancers.

FORTUNIO

“You would be very much astonished, my good Radin Mantri, to see civilisation closer. It consists in having newspapers and railways. The newspapers are great, square pieces of paper which are scattered through the city in the morning. They appear to have been printed with boot-blackening, and contain accounts of the events which have occurred in the city: dogs drowned, husbands beaten by their wives, and remarks on the condition of the cabinets of Europe, written by people who do not know how to write and whom one would not take for valets.

FORTUNIO

“The railways are grooves on which kettles gallop along, — a most entertaining spectacle !

“Besides the newspapers and the railways, there is a sort of constitutional mechanism, with a king who reigns and does not govern. When the poor devil of a king needs a million, he is obliged to ask it of three hundred country louts who meet at the end of a bridge and talk the year through without paying any attention to what other speakers have said. A speech on molasses is replied to by a philippic on fresh-water fishing. That is the way Europeans live.

“Their private manners are still more strange. You may call on their women at any hour of the day or night ; they go to walk or to balls with the first comer ; jealousy seems to be unknown to these people.

“The peers of France, generals, and diplomats generally take for mistresses opera dancers as thin as spiders, who betray them in favour of wig-makers, machinists, writers, or negroes. They know it very well, yet are not put out with them, — instead of having them sewn up in sacks and cast into the river, as would be proper.

FORTUNIO

“A singular and wide-spread taste among this people is love for old women. Almost all the actresses adored and run after by the public are at least sixty years of age. They have to be about fifty before any one finds out that they are pretty and have talent.

“As for the arts, their condition is far from being brilliant. All the fine pictures in the galleries are by old masters. There is, however, in Paris a poet whose name ends in go (Victor Hugo), who seems to me to do pretty good work,—but after all, I like King Soudraka, the author of ‘Vasantesena,’ just as much.

“I have not enjoyed myself greatly in Europe. The only pleasant thing I have met with is a little girl called Musidora, whom I should have liked to carry off to put into my seraglio; but with her stupid European ideas she would have been very unhappy in it, and I hate nothing more than to see long faces.

“I shall start in a few days. I have chartered three vessels to carry away what is worth taking, and I shall burn the rest. El Dorado shall disappear like a dream,—one or two barrels of powder will do the business.

FORTUNIO

“Farewell, old Europe, — old, though you think yourself young. Try to invent a steam engine to manufacture beautiful women, and to find a new gas to take the place of the sun. I am going to the East. It is simpler.”

One of Cleopatra's Nights

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

I

ABOUT nineteen hundred years ago a magnificent barge, gilded and painted, was flying down the Nile, impelled by fifty long, flat sweeps that rayed the surface of the water like the feet of a gigantic scarabæus. The barge, of slender proportions and admirably designed for speed, was long and narrow, and turned up at each end in the shape of the crescent of the young moon. The ram's-head surmounted by a gilded ball, placed at the point of the prow, denoted that the craft belonged to a personage of royal race. In the centre of the vessel rose a flat-roofed cabin, a sort of naos or tent of honour, painted and gilded, with a palmetto moulding and four small, square windows. Two cabins, also covered with hieroglyphs, were placed at each end of the crescent. One, larger than the other, had an upper story of less height, like the forecastle of the quaint galleys of the sixteenth century drawn by Della Bella. The smaller, which was the pilot's, ended in a triangular pediment.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

The rudder was formed of two huge sweeps fastened to posts painted with stripes, and showed in the water behind the barge like the web feet of a swan. Heads wearing the pschent and having on the chin the allegorical beard, were carved on the handle-ends of these great sweeps, which were worked by the pilot standing on his cabin roof.

The pilot was a dark-complexioned man, tawny like new bronze, with eyes slightly slanting at the outer corners, and full of bluish reflections, hair plaited into small cords, open mouth and prominent cheekbones, ears standing out from his head; in a word, a man of true Egyptian type. A narrow waistcloth wrinkling on his hips, and five or six strings of glass beads and amulets formed his costume. He appeared to be the only living person on the barge, for the rowers, bending to their sweeps and concealed by the plank-sheer, could only be guessed at by the symmetrical motion of the oars, which opened on either side of the barge like the leaves of a fan and struck the water after a slight pause.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

There was not a breath of air, and the great triangular sail, furled and stopped with a silken cord around the mast, which had been unshipped, proved that all hope of seeing the wind rise had been given up. The noonday sun poured down in fiery beams; the ashen, dry mud on the river-bank reverberated the heat; a crude, dazzling light, dusty, so intense was it, overspread everything with its torrents of flame; the blue sky whitened in the heat like metal in a furnace; a hot, dun mist smoked on the burning horizon. Not a cloud showed on the unchanging sky, as mournful as eternity.

The water of the Nile, colourless and dead, seemed to sleep on its course, and spread out in sheets of molten tin. No breath rippled its surface, or bowed on their stems the flowers of the lotus, still as if carved out of stone. Only from time to time the leap of a bechir or a fahaka made it sparkle like silver; the sweeps of the barge appeared to find it difficult to tear the dusky pellicle of the coagulated waters.

The banks were deserted. Immense, solemn melancholy brooded over the land, always a vast tomb, in which the living seemed to have no other occupation than to embalm the dead. An arid gloom, dry as pumice stone, without softness or reverie, without a pearly gray cloud to watch on the horizon, without a secret spring in which to bathe its dusty feet; the gloom of a sphinx weary of gazing forever at the desert, but which cannot leave the granite pedestal on which it has been sharpening its claws for twenty centuries.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

The silence was so deep that it was as though the world had become mute or the air had lost the power of conveying sound. The only murmur heard was the low whisper and laugh of the crocodiles weltering in the heat and wallowing amid the river reeds; or else some ibis, tired of standing one leg under its wing and its neck sunk between its shoulders, abandoned its motionless pose, and suddenly striking the blue air with its white wings, flew away and perched upon an obelisk or a palm tree.

The barge sped like an arrow over the water, leaving behind it a silver wake that soon was effaced; a few frothy bubbles breaking on the surface alone testified to the passage of the craft, already out of sight. The river banks, yellow and salmon-coloured, unrolled rapidly like papyrus bands between the double azure of the heaven and the water, these so alike in tone that the thin tongue of earth which separated them seemed a causeway built across an immense lake, and made it difficult to decide whether the Nile reflected the sky or the sky reflected the Nile.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

The prospect changed constantly. Sometimes gigantic propylæa mirroring in the river their sloping walls covered with large panels containing quaint figures; pylons with swelling capitals; stairways bordered by great crouching sphinxes wearing caps with fluted lapels and crossing their black basalt paws under their pointed breasts; huge palaces, showing against the horizon the stern, horizontal lines of their entablatures, on which the emblematic disc opened its monstrous wings like an eagle with exaggerated spread of pinions; temples, with enormous columns the size of towers, against the dazzling white background of which stood out processions of hieroglyphic figures, — all the wonders of the Titanic Egyptian architecture. Or again, a landscape desolate in its aridity: hills formed of small pieces of stone, the débris of excavations and constructions, crumbs of the gigantic granite debauch which had lasted for more than thirty centuries; mountains exfoliated by the heat, cut and rayed by black stripes like the marks of a conflagration; deformed hillocks crouching like the ram-headed sphinxes of the tombs and outlining against the sky their grotesque shapes. Nor was the aridity tempered in any way. No oasis of foliage refreshed the glance; green seemed a colour unknown in nature. Here and there a slender palm blossomed on the horizon, a thorny cactus raised its leaves sharp as bronze swords, a carthamum, finding a little humidity in the shadow of a broken column, broke with its red dot the general monotony.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Having cast this rapid glance upon the landscape, let us return to the fifty-oared barge and enter straight into the naos of honour. The interior of it was painted white with green arabesques, vermilion lines, and golden flowers of fantastic shape. A reed matting of extreme fineness covered the floor. At the end stood a sort of small bed with griffin's feet, with the back upholstered like a modern sofa or arm-chair, a footstool with four steps to ascend to it, and — a piece of refinement which strikes our ideas of comfort rather strangely — a sort of crescent of cedar wood mounted on a foot and destined to hold the neck and support the head of the sleeper.

On this strange pillow rested a very lovely head, one glance of whose eyes had wrought woe to half the world ; a head adored and divine ; the head of the most perfect woman that ever existed, the most womanly and the most queenly ; an admirable type to which poets have been unable to add and which dreamers always find at the end of their dreams. It was Cleopatra.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Near her, Charmian, her favourite slave, waved a broad fan of ibis feathers. A little maid watered with scented water the small reed blinds hung across the windows of the naos, in order that the air should enter only impregnated with coolness and perfume.

Near the couch, in a vase of wavy alabaster with slender spout, its slight, graceful shape vaguely recalling the profile of a heron, was plunged a bouquet of lotus flowers, some of a celestial blue, others of a tender rose like the finger-tips of Isis the great goddess.

Cleopatra on that day, either through caprice or policy, was not dressed in Greek fashion. She had just been present at the Panegyrics, and was returning to her summer palace in the Egyptian costume she had worn at the festival. My feminine readers may perhaps desire to know how Queen Cleopatra was dressed on her return from the Hammisi of Hermonthis, where is worshipped the trinity of the god Mandou, the goddess Ritho and her son Harphre, and I cannot refuse them this satisfaction.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Queen Cleopatra wore for a head-dress a sort of very light golden helmet formed of the body and wings of the sacred hawk ; the wings, falling fan-like on either side of the head, covered her temples and spread down almost over the neck, allowing to emerge through a small cut an ear rosier and more delicately formed than the shell whence rose Venus, whom the Egyptians name Hathor. The bird's tail was in the place where ladies wear their chignons ; its body, covered with imbricated feathers, and painted with different enamels, enveloped the upper part of the head, and the neck, gracefully turned towards the front, composed, with the head, a sort of horn dazzling with gems. A symbolical crest in the shape of a tower completed this elegant though curious head-dress. Hair as black as a starless night escaped from under the helmet and fell in long tresses upon fair shoulders, the upper portion of which alone could be seen above a collarette adorned with several rows of serpentine, azerodrach, and chrysoberyl. A robe of lawn with diagonal ribbing, a misty stuff, — woven air, ventus textilis, as Petronius has it, — fell like a white vapour around the beautiful body, the contours of which it delicately softened. The short sleeves fitted close on the shoulder, but were wider near the elbow, and showed a lovely arm and perfectly shaped hand; the arm bound with six circlets of gold, and the hand adorned with a ring representing a scarabæus. A sash, the knotted ends of which fell in front, marked the waist of the loose, easy tunic. A fringed cape completed the costume; and if a few barbaric words do not frighten my readers, I shall add that the dress was called schenti and the cape calasiris.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

I may add that Queen Cleopatra wore very thin, light sandals, turned up at the point and fastened over the instep like the long-pointed shoes of ladies in the Middle Ages.

Yet Queen Cleopatra did not wear the satisfied air of a woman sure of being perfectly beautiful and perfectly dressed. She twisted and turned upon her narrow bed, and her abrupt movements constantly disarranged the folds of her gauze conopeum, which Charmian readjusted with inexhaustible patience without ever ceasing to wave her fan.

"I am stifling in this room," said Cleopatra. "If Phtha, the god of fire, had started his furnaces here, it could not be hotter. The room is like an oven." And she passed the tip of her little tongue over her lips and stretched out her hand like a patient who looks for a cup that is not there.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Charmian, ever attentive, clapped her hands. A black slave, wearing a kilt pleated like an Albanian skirt, and a panther skin thrown over his shoulder, entered as swiftly as an apparition, holding in equilibrium in his left hand a tray laden with cups and slices of watermelon, and in his right a long vase provided with a spout like a teapot. The slave filled one of the cups, pouring from on high with marvellous dexterity, and placed it before the queen. Cleopatra wetted her lips with the drink, and turning upon Charmian her lovely black eyes, unctuous and lighted by a brilliant spark of light, —

"Oh, Charmian," she said, "I am weary."

II

CHARMIAN, foreseeing a confidence, put on an expression of dolorous assent, and drew nearer her mistress.

"I am horribly weary," went on Cleopatra, letting her arms fall as if discouraged and overcome; "Egypt crushes me and bears me down. That implacably blue sky is more gloomy than the deepest night of Erebus. Never a shadow and never a cloud ! Always that red, bloody sun gazing upon me like the eye of a cyclops ! See, Charmian, I would give a pearl for a drop of rain. From the burning orb of that bronze sky there has not fallen a single tear upon this desolate land. It is like the covering of a tomb, like the dome of a necropolis, — a sky as dead and dry as the mummies which it covers. It weighs on my shoulders like a cloak that is too heavy ; it troubles and worries me ; I feel as if I could not rise without striking my head against it. And then the country is truly frightful, — everything sombre, enigmatical, incomprehensible. Imagination gives birth but to monstrous chimeras and vast monuments. I am terrified by its architecture and its art. The colossi, condemned to remain eternally seated, their hands on their knees and their legs caught in the stone, weary me with their stupid immobility ; they oppress my eyes and my reason. When will the giant come who is to take them by the hand and relieve them of their watch of twenty centuries ? Even granite tires at last. Who is the master they are waiting for to leave the mountain on which they are seated, and to rise in sign of respect ?

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

What invisible flock do these great sphinxes guard, as they crouch like watch-dogs? — for they never close their eyes, and their claws are ever unsheathed. Why do they so obstinately fix their stony glare upon Eternity and the Infinite? What strange secret do their closed lips retain within their breasts? Right or left, whichever way I turn, I see naught but horrid monsters, dogs with men's heads, men with dogs' heads, chimeras born of hideous couplings in the dark depths of passages, — Anubis, Typhon, Osiris, yellow-eyed hawks whose inquisitive glance seems to traverse your heart and to see, beyond you, unnamable things, — a host of horrible animals and gods with scaly wings, hooked beaks, sharp claws, ever ready to devour and seize you if you but cross the threshold of the temple and raise the corner of the veil.

“ On the walls, on the pillars, on the ceilings, on the floors, in the palaces, in the temples, in the deepest depths and lowest wells of the necropolis, even in the entrails of the earth, whither light never reaches, where torches die out for lack of air, — everywhere and ever, endless carved and painted hieroglyphs telling in incomprehensible language things now no longer known, which belong doubtless to vanished creations; mighty buried works in which a whole people was worn out writing a king's epitaph. Mystery and granite — such is Egypt ! What a country for a woman and a queen who is young ! Nothing but threatening and funereal symbols, — the pedum, the tau, the allegorical disc, the curled serpent, the scales for the weighing of souls, — the Unknown, Death, and Nothingness ! For sole vegetation, stelæ inscribed with strange characters ; for avenues of trees, avenues of granite obelisks ; for soil, vast granite slabs of which each mountain can furnish but one ; for a heaven, granite ceilings, — eternity made palpable, a bitter and incessant sarcasm on the fragility and the shortness of life ; stairs made for Titans, which human feet cannot ascend and which have to be climbed by ladders ; pillars which a hundred arms could not surround ; labyrinths where one's way is lost before exit is found, — the vertigo of enormity, the intoxication of the gigantic, the disorder bred of pride which means at any cost to carve its name on the surface of the earth.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

“ And then, Charmian, let me tell you, — there is a thought that terrifies me. In other countries on this earth bodies are burned and their ashes are soon mingled with the soil ; here the living seem to have no other occupation than to preserve the dead. Powerful balms preserve them from destruction ; they retain their form and their aspect. The soul gone, the frame remains, and under this people lie twenty peoples ; each city stands upon twenty stories of tombs, each generation which disappears makes a new population of mummies in a darksome city. Under the father lie the grandfather and the ancestor in their painted and gilded boxes, such as they were during their life ; and the more you dig, the more you find. When I think of the multitudes wrapped in bandages, of the swarms of dried-up spectres which fill up the funeral wells and which have been there for two thousand years, face to face, in a silence that nothing breaks, not even the worm of the sepulchre as it crawls past, and which will be found intact after two thousand other years, with their cats and their crocodiles and their ibises and all that lived at the same time with them, — I feel overcome by terror, and I shudder with fear. What do they say, since they yet have lips, and their soul, if the fancy occurred to it, would find the body in the state in which it left it ?

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

“Egypt is indeed a sinister realm and not suited to me, who am gay and joyous. Everything contains a mummy ; it is the heart and the kernel of all things. After a thousand turns, it is there one ends. The pyramids conceal sarcophagi. It is all nothingness and vanity. For in vain they rip open the heavens with gigantic triangles of stone ; they cannot lengthen the bodies by one inch.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

“How is it possible to rejoice and laugh in such a land, where the only perfume is the bitter odour of naphtha and bitumen boiling in the kettles of the embalmers ; where the floor of your chamber sounds hollow because the corridors of hypogea and mummy pits extend even under your alcove ? It is pleasant, is it not, to be the queen of mummies, to have no one to chat with but statues in stiff, constrained attitudes ? Ah, if to temper this sadness I had at least some passion in my heart, some interest in my life, if I only loved some one or something ; if I were loved ! But I am not even that, and so I am weary, Charmian. Had I love, this arid, repellent Egypt would be more charming to me than Greece with its gods of ivory, its white marble temples, its woods of rose laurels and its springs of living water. I should not then think of the hideous face of Anubis and of the terrors of the subterranean cities.”

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Charmian smiled incredulously. "That cannot cause you very great grief, for every one of your glances pierces hearts like the golden arrows of Eros himself."

"How is a queen," replied Cleopatra, "to know whether it is she or her diadem that is loved. The radiance of her starry crown dazzles eyes and hearts. If I were not seated on a throne, should I be as famous and popular as Bacchides or Archenassa, or the first courtesan you could pick up in Athens or Miletus? A queen is something so far from men, raised so high, so apart, so impossible, that no presumption could hope to succeed in such an enterprise. She is no longer a woman; she is an august, sacred, sexless figure which men worship on their knees without loving her, as they worship the statue of a goddess. Who was ever seriously in love with Hera the snowy-armed, with Pallas the green-eyed? Who ever sought to kiss the silvery feet of Thetis or the rosy fingers of Dawn? What lover of divine beauties ever took wing to fly to the golden palaces of heaven? Respect and terror turn souls to stone in our presence, and to be loved by our like, one must descend to the necropolis of which I spoke but now."

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Although she made no objection to the reasoning of her mistress, a faint smile flitting over the lips of the Greek slave proved that she did not entirely believe in this inviolability of the royal person.

“Oh!” continued Cleopatra, “would that something might happen to me,—a strange, unexpected adventure! The song of poets, the dances of Syrian slaves, the feasts crowned with roses and prolonged until the dawn, the night hunts with Laconian dogs, the tame lions, the hump-backed dwarfs, the members of the Brotherhood of Inimitables, the combats in the arena, the new dresses, the byssus robes, the strings of pearls, the perfumes of Asia, the most exquisite refinements, the maddest splendour,—nothing now interests me. All things are indifferent, all things unbearable to me.”

“It is easy to be seen,” whispered Charmian, “that the queen has had no lover, and has had no one killed for a month.”

Tired by her long tirade, Cleopatra again took up the cup placed by her side and raised it to her lips, put her head under her arm with a dovelike motion, and settled herself as well as she could to sleep. Charmian untied her sandals and gently tickled the soles of her feet with the vane of a peacock's feather. Sleep soon cast its golden dust over the lovely eyes of Ptolemy's sister.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

And now that Cleopatra is slumbering, let us ascend to the deck of the vessel and enjoy the wondrous sight of the setting sun.

A broad violet band, warmed by reddish tones in the west, fills the lower portion of the heavens. As it meets the azure zones, the violet tint melts into pale lilac and disappears in the blue with a rosy half-tint. On the side on which the sun, red as a buckler fallen from the forge of Vulcan, casts its crimson reflection, the tint turns to pale lemon-yellow and produces effects similar to those of a turquoise. The water, touched by an oblique ray, has the mat brilliancy of a mirror seen on the silvered side, or of a damascened blade. The sinuosities of the bank, the reeds, and the broken outlines of the shore stand out in strong black and bring out the more vividly the whitish reverberation. By the twilight luminousness one can perceive afar, like a grain of dust fallen upon quicksilver, a little brown dot that trembles in a network of luminous threads. Is it a teal diving, a tortoise drifting down stream, a crocodile raising the end of its squamous nose, in order to breathe the cooler air of evening, or the belly of a hippopotamus turning on the water? Or is it a rock left uncovered by the sinking of the river? For old Hapimau, Father of Waters, is in great need of filling his empty urn with the rains of the solstice in the Mountains of the Moon.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

It is nothing of the kind. By the pieces of Osiris, so happily put together again, it is a man who seems to walk or skate over the water. One can now see the skiff which upbears him, a little nutshell, a hollowed fish, three bands of bark put together, one forming the floor and two the sides, solidly fastened at each end with tarred cords. A man stands, one foot on each gunwale of the frail craft, which he manages with a single paddle that performs at the same time the office of rudder, and although the royal barge, impelled by fifty oars, flies swiftly along, the little black skiff is plainly gaining upon it. Cleopatra wished but now for a strange adventure, for something unexpected. That little slender craft with its mysterious ways strikes me as bearing with it, if not an adventure, at least an adventurer. Perchance it contains the hero of my tale.

In any case, he is a handsome young fellow of twenty, with hair so black that it shows blue against the golden skin, and of such perfect proportions that he might have been cast in bronze by Lysippus. Although he has been paddling for a long time, he shows no signs of fatigue, and not a single bead of perspiration marks his brow.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

The sun was sinking below the horizon, and against its disc stood out the brown silhouette of a distant city which the eye could not have perceived but for this chance effect of light. Soon it sank altogether, and the stars, the fair ones of the night sky, opened their golden calyxes in the azure firmament. The royal barge, closely followed by the little skiff, stopped near a black marble staircase, on each step of which was placed one of the sphinxes abhorred of Cleopatra. It was the landing-place of the Summer Palace.

Cleopatra, leaning on the arm of Charmian, passed rapidly like a dazzling vision between the double lines of slaves bearing torches. The young man lifted from the bottom of his skiff a great lion's skin, cast it over his shoulder, sprang lightly to the shore, drew up the skiff on the bank and walked towards the palace.

III

WHO is this young man who, standing in a boat of bark, has the assurance to follow the royal barge, and rivals the speed of fifty oarsmen of the country of Kush, bare to the waist and rubbed with palm oil? What interest urges him to his deed? This is what I am obliged to know, in consequence of being a poet gifted with intuition, for whom all men, and even all women,—which is yet more difficult,—must have in the side the window called for by Momus.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

It is not perhaps very easy to ascertain the thoughts of a young man of some two thousand years ago, from the land of Keme, who has followed the barge of Cleopatra, Queen and Goddess Evergetes, returning from the Hammisi of Hermonthis; nevertheless, I shall try.

Meïamoun, son of Mandouschopsch, was a young man of strange character. All that touches ordinary mortals made no impression upon him. He seemed to belong to a higher race. His glance had the brilliancy and fixity of the hawk, a serene majesty dwelt upon his brow as on a marble pedestal; a noble disdain curled his upper lip and swelled his nostrils like those of a spirited steed. Although he had almost the delicate grace of a young maid, and Dionysius, the effeminate god, had not a rounder and more polished breast, he concealed under this appearance of softness muscles of steel and Herculean strength, for he enjoyed the privilege of certain natures of antiquity which united in themselves the beauty of woman and the strength of man. As for his complexion, I am constrained to confess that he was the colour of an orange, quite contrary to the rosy and white ideal of beauty which we indulge in; it did not, however, prevent his being a very charming young fellow, much sought after by all manner of red, yellow, copper-coloured, brown, and golden women, and even by more than one white-skinned Greek.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Do not, however, conclude from this that Meïamoun was a lady-killer. The ashes of old Priam, and icy Hippolytus himself were not more insensible and colder; a young neophyte in his white tunic, who is preparing to be initiated into the mysteries of Isis, does not lead a chaster life; a young girl who shivers in the glacial shadow of her mother has not as much timid purity.

The pleasures of Meïamoun were, nevertheless, of a curious kind for so shy a young man. He would start quietly in the morning with his little buckler of hippopotamus skin, his harpe, or curved sword, his triangular bow, and his serpent-skin quiver filled with barbed arrows. Then he would dash into the desert, and send his slender-limbed steed, with its small head and flying mane, at full speed until he came across the track of a lioness. He greatly enjoyed taking the lion cubs from their watching mother. In everything he cared only for what was perilous or impossible. He loved to walk along impossible paths, to swim in turbulent waters, and he would have preferred to bathe in the Nile where it falls in cataracts. He had a love for the abyss. Such was Meïamoun, son of Mandouschopsch.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

For some time past he had become more fond of solitude than ever. He would disappear for whole months within the ocean of sand, and reappear only at rare intervals. His anxious mother in vain bent from the top of her terrace and questioned the road with untiring eyes. After a long waiting a small cloud of dust would whirl on the horizon. Soon it would open and show Meïamoun, covered with dust, on his steed as thin as a she-wolf, with red, bloodshot eyes, quivering nostrils, and cicatrices on her flanks not due to spurs. Then, after having hung up in his room the skin of a hyena or a lion, he would start off again.

And yet no one could have been happier, had he chosen, than Meïamoun. He was loved by Nephte, the daughter of the priest Afomouthis, the loveliest girl in the nome of Arsinoïtes. Any one but Meïamoun would have seen that Nephte had lovely eyes turned up at the corners with an indefinable expression of voluptuousness, a mouth on which flashed a rosy smile, white, clear teeth, exquisitely rounded arms, and feet more perfectly shaped than the jasper feet of the statue of Isis. Unquestionably, in all Egypt no one had a tinier hand or longer hair. Nephte's charms could have been surpassed only by the charms of Cleopatra. But who would think of falling in love with Cleopatra? Ixion, who loved Juno, clasped but a cloud in his arms, and is eternally turning his wheel in Hades.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Yet it was Cleopatra whom Meïamoun loved. At first he had endeavoured to overcome the mad passion; he had struggled bodily with it; but love is not to be choked as a lion is choked, and the most vigorous athletes are powerless against it. The arrow had remained in the wound, and he dragged it everywhere with him. The image of Cleopatra, radiant and splendid in her diadem with its golden spikes, standing alone in her imperial purple amid the kneeling people, shone upon him in his waking hours and in his sleep. Like the imprudent man who has gazed at the sun and who ever after sees a spot fluttering incessantly before him, so did Meïamoun ever behold Cleopatra. Eagles may gaze at the sun without being dazzled, but what diamond eye could be fixed with impunity upon a beautiful woman, upon a beautiful queen?

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

His life was spent in wandering around the royal dwellings in order to breathe the same air as Cleopatra, to kiss on the sand — a happiness, alas ! too rare — the half-effaced imprint of her foot. He attended the sacred festivals and celebrations, and tried to catch a glance of her eyes, to seize as she passed by one of the thousand aspects of her beauty. Sometimes he became ashamed of this mad existence, and then indulged in hunting with increased fury, endeavouring to tame by fatigue his hot blood and his passionate desires.

He had gone to the Panegyrics of Hermonthis, and in the vague hope of seeing the queen for a second when she landed at the Summer Palace, he had followed the barge on his skiff, without caring for the fierce beating of the sun, in a heat fit to bring out a sweat of lava upon the sphinxes lying breathless on their blazing pedestals. Then he understood that he had reached a supreme moment, that his fate was about to be decided, and that he could not die with his secret untold.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

It is a strange situation for a man to be in — to love a queen; it is as if he loved a star. But the star will come every night to shine in its place in the heavens; it keeps a sort of mysterious tryst; it can be found; it can be seen, and glances do not offend it. But, oh, wretchedness! to be poor, unknown, obscure, to be at the very bottom of the ladder, and to feel one's heart full of love for a solemn, radiant, splendid creature, for a woman whose meanest maid would not even look at one! To fix one's glance unchangingly upon some one who sees not, who will never see; for whom one is but a wave in the crowd like other waves, and who passes one a hundred times without recognition! To have, if the occasion to speak occurs, no justification for one's mad audacity, neither a poet's talent nor great genius nor superhuman qualities, — nothing but love; and in exchange for beauty, nobility, power, all the splendours of one's dream, to bring in one's hands passion or youth only, not very rare things!

These thoughts overwhelmed Meïamoun, as he lay flat on the sand, his chin in his hands. He allowed himself to be swept away and borne along on the stream of passing reverie; he sketched a thousand plans, each more insensate than the others. He realised that what he aimed at was impossible, but he had not the courage to frankly give up, and treacherous hope whispered lying promises in his ear.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

“Hathor, mighty goddess,” he murmured, “what have I done to you to make me so unhappy! Are you avenging yourself for my disdain of Nephte, the daughter of the priest Afoumouthis? Are you angry with me for having repelled Lamia, the Athenian hetaira, or Flora, the Roman courtesan? Is it my fault if my heart can feel only the beauty of Cleopatra, your sole rival? Why have you driven into my heart the poisoned barb of impossible love? What sacrifices and what offerings do you ask? Shall I build you a chapel of rose marble of Syêné, with columns and gilded capitals and a ceiling of one stone, and hieroglyphs cut by the best workmen of Memphis or Thebes? Answer me!”

But, like all gods and goddesses whom men call upon, Hathor answered nothing.

Meïamoun came to a desperate decision.

Cleopatra, on her part, was also invoking the goddess Hathor, asking of her a new pleasure, some yet unknown sensation. Languidly leaning upon her couch, she reflected that the number of senses is very limited; that the most exquisite refinement is quickly followed by disgust, and that it is very difficult indeed for a queen to fill up her days. To try new poisons upon slaves, to have men fight with tigers, or gladiators fight with each other, to drink molten pearls, to devour a province, — all that was tasteless and commonplace. Charmian was reduced to expedients, and did not know what had come to her mistress.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Suddenly a hissing sound was heard, and an arrow quivered in the cedar wainscoting of the wall.

Cleopatra nearly fainted with terror. Charmian bent out of the window, but saw nothing save a fleck of foam on the river. A strip of paper was wound around the shaft of the arrow. Upon it were written these words in phonetic characters: "I love you."

IV

"I LOVE you!" repeated Cleopatra, twisting between her slender, white fingers the piece of papyrus rolled scutula fashion. "These are the words that I asked for. What intelligent soul, what concealed genius, has so well understood my desire?" And entirely roused from her languorous torpor, she sprang from her couch with the agility of a kitten that smells a mouse, put her little, fairy feet into embroidered slippers, cast a byssus tunic on her shoulders, and hastened to the window out of which Charmian was still looking.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

The night was clear and serene. The moon, which had already risen, cast great angles of shadow and light upon the architectural masses of the palace, which stood out strangely against a transparent, bluish background, and shimmered in silver upon the waters of the stream on which its rays lengthened out in a sparkling trail. A light breath of air, that might have been mistaken for the purring of the sleeping sphinxes, made the reeds quiver and the azure bells of lotus shiver. The cables of the boats moored by the banks of the Nile creaked softly, and the wave plained on the shore like a mateless dove. A vague perfume of vegetation, sweeter than that of the incense burned by the priests of Anubis, came up into the room. It was one of the enchanted nights of the East, more splendid than our loveliest days, for our sun is not the equal of such a moon.

“Do you not see yonder, about the centre of the stream, the head of a swimmer? See, he is now traversing the stretch of light, and is about to disappear in the shadow. Now we can no longer make him out." And leaning upon Charmian's shoulder, she projected half of her beautiful body from the window in order to try to find the trace of the mysterious swimmer. But a wood of Nile acacias, of dôm palms and sealehs cast a shadow over the river at this place and protected the flight of the audacious man. If Meïamoun had had the wit to turn around, he would have caught sight of Cleopatra, the starry queen, whose glance was eagerly seeking him through the night, — him, the poor obscure Egyptian, the wretched lion-hunter.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

"Charmian, send for Phrehipephbour, the chief of the rowers, and let two boats be sent without delay in pursuit of this man," said Cleopatra, whose curiosity was excited to the highest degree.

Phrehipephbour appeared. He was a man of the Nahasi race, with broad hands, muscular arms, wearing a red cap not unlike the Phrygian helmet, and close-fitting drawers striped diagonally white and blue. His torso, entirely bare, shone in the light of the lamp, black and polished like a jet globe. He received the queen's orders, and at once withdrew to carry them out.

Two long, narrow skiffs, so light that the least carelessness would have caused them to capsize, were soon dashing across the Nile under the impulse of twenty vigorous oarsmen. But the quest was fruitless. After having explored the river in every direction and searched every tuft of reeds, Phrehipephbour returned to the palace without having done more than caused a sleeping heron to take flight and upset the digestion of a crocodile or two.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Cleopatra was so bitterly disappointed that she experienced a lively wish to doom Phrehipephbour to the grindstone or to the wild beasts. Fortunately Charmian interceded for the trembling wretch, who turned pale under his black skin. It was the first time in her life that one of Cleopatra's desires had not at once been fulfilled; she therefore experienced an uneasy surprise, a sort of first doubt as to her omnipotence.

Shé, Cleopatra, wife and sister of Ptolemy, proclaimed Goddess Evergetes, the Living Queen of the Lower and the Upper Regions, the Eye of Light, the Beloved of the Sun, as may be seen by the cartouches carved upon the temple walls, — she to meet with an obstacle, to have willed something which was not done, to have spoken and not been obeyed! She might just as well be the wife of some poor undertaker and melt bitumen in a kettle. It was monstrous, it was outrageous, and indeed, if she had not been a very gentle and clement queen, she would have that wretch Phrehipephbour crucified.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Yet she had wished for an adventure, for something strange and unexpected, and her wish was gratified. Her kingdom was not as dead as she had thought; it was no stone statue's arm that shot the arrow; it was not from a mummy's heart that came the three words that had moved her, she who looked with a smile at her poisoned slaves, beating their heads and heels in agony upon her lovely pavements of mosaic and porphyry, she who applauded the tiger when it had torn open the side of the conquered gladiator!

She can have whatever she pleases: silver cars studded with emeralds, quadrigæ of griffins, tunics of purple thrice dyed, mirrors of polished steel set in precious stones so bright that she can see her beauty in them, gowns from the land of Serica, so fine, so tenuous that they could be passed through the ring on her little finger, pearls of perfect shape, cups by Lysippus or Myron, Indian parrots that speak like poets, — she can have everything she pleases, even if she call for the cestus of Venus or the pschent of Isis, but she will not have to-night the man who shot the arrow that still quivers in the cedar-wood of her bed.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

The slaves who will dress her to-morrow will not have a pleasant time. They had better be deft and light-handed, or the golden pins on the dressing-table may be thrust into the breast of the unskilful hair-dresser, and the rubber run the risk of being hanged from the ceiling by her feet.

“Who could have had the audacity to shoot that declaration fastened to an arrow? Is it the nomarch Ammon Ra, who believes himself more beautiful than the Apollo of the Greeks, or is it Cheopsira, the commander of Hermotybios, so proud of his battles in the country of Kush? Or may it not be rather young Sextus, the Roman debauchee, who rouges, lisps, and wears Persian sleeves?”

“O Queen, none of these. Although you are the loveliest woman in the world, these people flatter you and do not love you. Ammon Ra has an idol to which he will be always faithful, — himself; Cheopsira the warrior thinks only of telling his battles; as for Sextus, he is so taken up with compounding a new cosmetic that he has no thoughts for anything else. Besides, he has received from Laconia yellow tunics brocaded with gold, and Asiatic children which entirely take up his attention. None of these handsome lords would risk his neck in so bold and perilous an enterprise, — they do not love you enough for that. But yesterday you said in your barge that dazzled eyes dare not gaze upon you, that men could only turn pale and fall at your feet in supplication, and that there was nothing left for you but to awaken in his gilded bier some old Pharaoh perfumed with bitumen. Now here is a young and ardent heart that loves you. What will you do with it?"

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

That night Cleopatra had much difficulty in going to sleep. She turned in her bed; she long called in vain for Morpheus the brother of Death. She repeated several times that she was the most unfortunate of queens, that everybody took pains to be contrary, that life was unbearable, — terrible grievances which did not touch Charmian very much, although she pretended to sympathise with them.

Let me leave Cleopatra in search of the sleep which avoids her, as she turns over in her mind the names of all the great at court, and let me return to Meïamoun. More skilful than Phrehiophbour, chief of the rowers, I shall manage to find him.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Terrified by his own boldness, Meïamoun had cast himself into the Nile and had swum across to the little grove of dôp palms before Phrehipephbour had launched the two boats in pursuit of him. When he had recovered his breath and thrown back behind his ears his long hair covered with the foam of the stream, he felt more comfortable and calmer. Cleopatra now had something that came from him ; there was now a bond between them. Cleopatra thought of him, Meïamoun. It might have been an angry thought, but at least he had awakened in her some emotion, terror, anger, or pity ; he had compelled her to be aware of his existence. It is true that he had forgotten to put his name upon the paper strip, but what would "Meïamoun, son of Mandouschopsch," have told the queen ? A monarch or a slave were the same to her. A deity does not lower herself any more if she takes for her lover a man of the people than if she takes a patrician or a king. When one is placed so high, love alone is seen in a man.

The words that pressed upon his heart like the knee of a bronze statue had at last gone forth ; they had traversed the air, had reached the queen, the apex of the triangle, the inaccessible summit. In her disillu-sioned heart he had excited curiosity, which was a good deal.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Meïamoun had no idea that he had succeeded so well, but he was calmer, for he had sworn to himself by the mystic bari which takes souls to Amenti, by the sacred birds, Bennu and Gheughen, by Typhon, by Osiris, by all the terrors of Egyptian mythology, that he would be Cleopatra's lover, were it but a night, were it but an hour, even if it cost him his soul and body.

It would be useless to try to explain how this love had come about, — love for a woman whom he had only seen from afar and to whom he scarce dared lift his eyes, he who did not cast them down before the yellow orbs of lions ; or how that little grain, fallen by chance in his soul, had grown so quickly and thrown out such deep roots. It is a mystery ; as I have said, the abyss attracted him.

When he was quite sure that Phrehipephbour had returned with the oarsmen, he sprang a second time into the Nile and swam towards Cleopatra's palace, where a lamp shone through a purple curtain like a radiant star. Leander did not swim towards the Tower of Sestos more boldly and vigorously, yet Meïamoun was not awaited by a Hero, ready to pour upon his head vials of perfumes in order to drive away the smell of the sea and the bitter kisses of the tempest. The best that could happen to him was a good lance-thrust or sword-cut; and, truth to tell, he was not much afraid of it.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

He swam for some time along the palace wall, the marble base of which plunged into the river, and stopped before a submerged opening into which the water rushed with a whirl. He dived two or three times unsuccessfully. Finally he was luckier, found the passage, and disappeared.

The arcade was a vaulted canal which led the waters of the Nile to the baths of Cleopatra.

V

It was not until morning, at the time when dreams come back after their flight through the ivory gates, that Cleopatra slept. In her visions she saw all manner of lovers swimming or scaling walls to reach her, and — a remembrance of the night before — endless arrows bearing declarations of love. Her little feet, agitated by nervous tremulousness, beat upon the breast of Charmian lying across the bed to serve her as a pillow.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

When she awoke, the brilliant sunshine was playing through the window curtain and lighting it up with innumerable points of light ; it came familiarly to the bed and fluttered like a golden butterfly around her lovely shoulders, on which it dropped a kiss of light as it flashed. Happy sunbeam, which the gods would have envied !

Cleopatra, in a dying voice like a sick child's, called her maids to help her to rise. Two of her women lifted her in their arms and placed her carefully on the ground on a great tiger-skin, with claws of gold and eyes of carbuncles. Charmian wrapped her in a linen calasiris whiter than milk, bound her hair with a net of silver threads, and placed on her feet sandals of cork, on the soles of which, as a mark of contempt, had been drawn two grotesque figures representing two men of the Nahasi and Namou races, bound hand and foot, so that Cleopatra literally deserved the epithet, "She who treads on the Nations," which she bears in the royal cartouches.

It was the hour for the bath. Cleopatra went thither with her women. The baths were constructed in vast gardens filled with mimosas, carobs, aloes, lemon-trees, and Persian apple-trees, whose luxuriant coolness contrasted delightfully with the aridity of the environs. Great terraces supported masses of verdure, and carried the flowers to heaven by giant staircases of rose granite. Vases of Pentelic marble bloomed like great lilies by the side of the steps, and the plants they contained seemed to be merely their pistils. Chimeras carved by the most skilful of Greek sculptors, and less repellent in appearance than the Egyptian sphinxes with their sour mien and their morose attitudes, lay idly on the sward diapered with flowers, like slender white greyhounds on the carpet of a drawing-room. They represented charming figures of women, straight-nosed, smooth-browed, with small mouths, arms delicately plump, round, clean breasts, with earrings, necklaces, and ornaments of exquisite fancifulness, and ending in fish-tails, like the woman of whom Horace speaks, or in birds' wings, or in the quarters of a lioness, or in volutes of foliage, according to the fancy of the artist and the exigencies of the architecture. A double row of these lovely monsters bordered the avenue leading from the palace to the bath hall.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

At the end of the avenue lay a large basin with four porphyry steps leading through the transparent, sparkling water to the bottom covered with golden dust.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Statues of women, ending in a block like caryatids, poured from their breasts thin streams of scented water, which fell into the basin in silver spray and broke its clear surface with their glittering drops. Besides this purpose, the caryatids served the further one of bearing on their heads entablatures adorned with Nereids and Tritons in bas-relief, and provided with bronze rings to which were fastened the silken cords of the awning. Beyond the portico were seen cool, bluish greenery, umbrageous shades, a bit of the Vale of Tempe transported to Egypt. The famous gardens of Semiramis were as nothing by the side of these. I shall not mention the seven or eight other halls of different temperatures, with warm or cold vapour, boxes of perfumes, cosmetics, ointments, pumice-stones, hair gloves and all the refinements of the art of bathing carried by antiquity to so high a pitch of voluptuousness and refinement.

Cleopatra arrived leaning upon Charmian's shoulder. She had walked at least thirty steps by herself, a wondrous effort, a dreadful fatigue! A faint, rosy flush, showing under the transparent skin of her cheeks, brightened their warm pallor. Her temples, golden like amber, showed a network of blue veins; her smooth brow, low like the brows of the women of antiquity, but perfectly rounded and shaped, was joined by an irreproachable line to a clean, straight nose, with rosy nostrils that palpitated at the least emotion like the nostrils of an amorous tigress; a small, round mouth, close to the nose, with disdainfully curled lip; but mad voluptuousness, incredible ardour of life, beamed in the red brilliancy, the humid lustre of her lower lip. Her eyelids were narrow, her eyebrows thin and almost straight. I shall not attempt to give an idea of her eyes, which were filled with a fire, a languor, a brilliant limpidity, that would have turned the dog's head of Anubis himself. Every one of her glances was a poem superior to those of Mimnermus or Homer. An imperial chin, full of strength and power, worthily rounded out her exquisite profile.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

She remained standing on the first step of the basin in a proud, graceful attitude, leaning slightly backward, one foot uplifted, like a goddess about to leave her pedestal, her glance still fixed upon heaven; two superb folds fell from the tips of her breasts straight to the ground. Cleomenes, had he been her contemporary and able to see her, would have smashed his Venus for very annoyance.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Before entering the water, a new caprice led her to order Charmian to change her silver-net head-dress. She preferred a wreath of lotus flowers with reeds like a marine deity. Charmian obeyed. Her hair, unbound, fell in black masses upon her shoulders, and hung down her cheeks like ripe grapes. Then the linen tunic, held up by a single golden clasp, was undone, slipped down from her marble body, and fell like a white cloud at her feet, like the swan at the feet of Leda.

And where was Meïamoun? Ah, cruel fate! so many insensible things enjoy favours which would transport a lover with rapture. The wind toys with the perfumed hair or kisses lovely lips which it cannot appreciate; the water, indifferent to voluptuousness, envelops with a single caress the beautiful, adored body; the mirror reflects her many charming images; the cothurn or the sandal encloses a divinely small foot; — oh, how much delight wasted!

Cleopatra dipped into the water her golden foot, and descended a few steps. The shimmering water made her a belt and bracelets of silver, and rolled in pearls upon her breasts and shoulders like a broken necklace; her long hair, supported by the water, stretched behind her like a regal mantle. She was a queen even in her bath. She came and went, plunged and brought up handfuls of golden sand which she laughingly threw at her women; at other times she hung over the balustrade of the basin, alternately hiding and revealing her charms, sometimes showing only her polished, lustrous back, sometimes exhibiting herself fully like Venus Anadyomene, and constantly varying the aspect of her beauty.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Suddenly she uttered a cry shriller than Diana's when surprised by Actæon. Through the foliage she had seen shining a burning glance, yellow and phosphorescent, like the eye of a crocodile or of a lion. It was Meïamoun, who, lying on the ground behind a tuft of foliage, more agitated than a fawn in a grain-field, was drinking in the dangerous joy of gazing upon the queen in her bath.

Although he was brave to rashness, Cleopatra's cry pierced his heart more coldly than a sword-thrust. A deathly sweat broke out on his body; his blood surged to his temples with a strident sound, and the iron grasp of anxiety clutched his throat and choked him. The eunuchs hastened up, lance in hand. Cleopatra pointed out the group of trees, where they found Meïamoun curled up in concealment.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Defence was impossible; he did not even attempt it, but allowed himself to be arrested. They were making ready to slay him with the cruel and stupid impassibility characteristic of eunuchs; but Cleopatra, who had had time to wrap herself in her calasiris, signed to them to stop and bring the prisoner before her.

Meïamoun fell at her feet, holding out towards her supplicating hands, as if she were the altar of the gods.

“Are you one of Rome’s paid murderers? What were you doing within this sacred place whence men are banished?” said Cleopatra, with an imperious gesture of interrogation.

“May my soul be found light in the scales of Amente, and Tmei, daughter of the Sun and goddess of Truth, banish me, if I have ever entertained any evil thought towards you, O Queen,” replied Meïamoun, still kneeling.

Sincerity and loyalty shone on his face so plainly that Cleopatra at once put away that thought, and fixed on the young Egyptian a less severe and less angry look. She thought him handsome.

“Then what motive brought you to a place where death alone awaited you?”

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

"I love you," murmured Meïamoun in a low but distinct voice ; for his courage had come back, as in all extreme situations when at their worst.

"Oh!" said Cleopatra, bending towards him and seizing his arm with an abrupt, unexpected motion. "Then it was you who shot the arrow with the roll of papyrus! By Oms, the dog of the lower regions, you are a very bold wretch. Now I know you. I have long seen you wandering like a mournful shadow around the places I dwell in. You were at the procession of Isis, at the Panegyrics of Hermonthis ; you followed my royal barge. Ah! you want a queen! Your ambition is not very modest. No doubt you expected to have your love requited,—of course I shall love you ; why not?"

"O Queen," replied Meïamoun, with grave melancholy, "do not hurl sarcasms at me. I am mad, it is true ; I have deserved death, that is true also. Be humane and have me slain."

"No, I shall indulge in the fancy of being clement to-day. I grant you your life."

"And what would you have me do with my life? I love you."

"Well, you shall be satisfied ; you shall die!"

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

answered Cleopatra. "You dreamed a strange, an extravagant dream; your desires and your longings crossed the forbidden place. You thought you were Cæsar or Mark Antony, and you loved the Queen. In your hours of delirium you fancied, perchance, that circumstances which happen but once in a thousand years, might lead Cleopatra to love you one day! Well, what you believed impossible shall be; I shall turn your dream into reality; for once I shall enjoy satisfying a mad hope. I shall overwhelm you with splendour, with radiance and lightnings; I mean that your fortune shall be dazzling. You were at the bottom of the wheel, I shall put you at the top, abruptly, suddenly, without a transition. I take you from nothingness and make you the equal of the gods,—and then I shall plunge you back into nothingness. But do not call me cruel, do not implore my pity, do not weaken when the hour strikes. I am kind, I favour your folly. I have the right to have you slain at once, but you tell me you love me; you shall be slain to-morrow. Your life shall be given in exchange for one night. I am generous. I purchase it, though I might take it. But why are you at my feet? Rise and give me your hand to return to the palace."

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

VI

OUR world is very small in comparison with the world of antiquity, our feasts very mean by the side of the terrific sumptuosity of Roman patricians and of Asiatic princes. Their ordinary meals would now pass for mad orgies, and the whole of a modern city could live for a week upon what was left by Lucullus after supping with a few intimate friends. We find it difficult to understand, with our miserable habits, these vast lives which realised all that imagination can invent in the way of boldness and strangeness and of most monstrously abnormal. Our palaces are stables in which Caligula would not have put his horses; the richest of our constitutional kings does not maintain the state of the humblest satrap or of a Roman proconsul. The brilliant skies that shone upon earth have died forever in the nothingness of uniformity. Above the black swarm of men rise no more those colossi whose Titan forms traversed the world with three strides like the heroes of Homer. There are no more towers of Lylacq, no more giant Babels raising to the heavens infinite spirals; no more immeasurable temples built of pieces of mountains; no more regal terraces which centuries and nations could increase one course only at a time, and whence the prince, leaning on his elbow and sunk in thought, could look upon the figure of the world as upon an outspread map. No more labyrinthine cities, formed of inextricable masses of cyclopean edifices, with deep circumvallations, amphitheatres filled with roars night and day, reservoirs overflowing with sea-water and peopled with leviathans and whales, colossal staircases, superimposed terraces, towers whose summits were lost in clouds, giant palaces, aqueducts, vomitories and sombre necropolis. Alas! we have nothing left but plaster hives upon a checker-work of pavement.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

It is amazing that men did not revolt against the confiscation of all riches and living forces for the benefit of a few privileged ones, and that such exorbitant fancies did not meet with obstacles upon their bloody road. The reason is that these wondrous lives were the realisation in the light of day of the dreams which each man dreamed at night; they were the incarnation of the common thought, and the nations saw themselves living, symbolised in those meteoric names which flame vividly in the night of ages. To-day, deprived of the dazzling spectacle of almighty will and the high contemplation of the human soul, whose least desire manifested itself in incredible actions, in enormities of granite and bronze, the world is hopelessly and desperately weary; man is no longer represented in his imperial fancy.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

The story which I write and the great name of Cleopatra which comes into it, have led to these reflections which sound ill in civilised ears; but the spectacle of the world of antiquity is so crushing, so discouraging to imaginations which believe they are extreme, and to minds which think they have attained the utmost limits of fairy magnificence, that I could not help embodying here my complaints and my regret at not having been the contemporary of Sardanapalus, Tiglath-Pileser, Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt, or even of Heliogabalus, Emperor of Rome and Priest of the Sun.

I have now to describe a supreme orgy, a feast by the side of which Balshazzar's would have paled,—one of Cleopatra's nights. How can I, with the French tongue, so chaste, so icily prudish, reproduce the frantic madness, the vast and mighty debauch, which unhesitatingly mingled the purple of blood and wine, and the furious impulses of unsatisfied voluptuousness seeking the impossible, with all that fire of the senses which the long Christian fast has not yet deadened?

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

The promised night was to be splendid. All the joys possible to human existence had to be crowded into a few hours. Meïamoun's life was to be concentrated into a powerful elixir which he could drain at a draught. Cleopatra willed to dazzle her voluntary victim and to plunge him into a whirlwind of vertiginous voluptuousness, to intoxicate, to stun him with the wine of orgy, so that death, although expected, should come unseen and not understood.

Let me take my readers into the banquet hall.

Our existing architecture offers few points of comparison with the mighty buildings, the ruins of which resemble fallen mountains rather than edifices. It took all the exaggeration of antique life to animate and fill these prodigious palaces, the halls of which were so vast that they could have no ceiling other than the heavens,—a magnificent roof well worthy of such architecture.

The banqueting hall was of enormous and Babylonian proportions; the glance could not fathom its immeasurable depths. Monstrous columns, short, squat, sturdy enough to upbear the poles, raised their heavy, swelling shafts upon pedestals covered with hieroglyphs, and supported on their massive capitals gigantic granite arches rising in courses like overset stairs. By each pillar a colossal basalt sphinx, crowned with the pschent, stretched out its head with its bearded chin, and with its oblique glance stared fixedly and mysteriously into the hall. On the second story, back of the first, the capitals of the columns, themselves more slender, were formed of four heads of women placed back to back, with fluted beards and the convoluted Egyptian head-dress. Instead of sphinxes, bull-headed idols, impassible spectators of nocturnal and furious orgies, were seated on stone thrones like patient guests awaiting the beginning of the feast. The third story, of a different order, with bronze elephants projecting scented water through their trunks, crowned the edifice, and over all the sky spread like a blue abyss and the inquisitive stars leaned upon the frieze.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Prodigious staircases of porphyry, so polished that they reflected bodies like mirrors, ascended and descended on all sides and bound together these vast architectural masses.

I am merely giving a rapid sketch, to give an idea of the tremendous building with its superhuman proportions. It would take the brush of Martin, the great painter of vanished enormities, and I have but a meagre pen-stroke instead of the apocalyptic depths of steel-plate engravings; but imagination must make up for what is wanting. Less fortunate than the painter or the musician, I can only present things one after another.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

I have spoken of the architecture alone, leaving the guests aside, and even the banquet-hall I have merely indicated. Cleopatra and Meïamoun await us; they are now coming forward.

Meïamoun wore a linen tunic embroidered with stars, a mantle of purple and bands in his hair like an Eastern potentate. Cleopatra wore a sea-green robe open at the sides and held together by golden bees; on her fair arms two rows of great pearls; on her head a golden pointed crown. Instead of a smile on her lips, a shadow of preoccupation slightly darkened her lovely face, and her brows sometimes met with a feverish motion. What was troubling the great queen? As for Meïamoun, he had the radiant and luminous appearance of a visionary in ecstasy. Brilliant effluvia springing from his temples and his brow formed a golden nimbus around his head, as if he were one of the twelve great gods of Olympus; a deep, serious joy shone in his eyes. He had embraced his chimera with the quick wings and it had not flown away; he was realising the aim of his life. If he were to live to the age of Nestor and Priam, if his veined temples were to be covered with white hair like that of the high priest of Ammon, he could feel nothing new, he could learn nothing more. He had obtained so much more than his wildest hopes that the world had nothing left to give him.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Cleopatra made him sit down by her side on a throne supported by golden griffins, and clapped her little hands together. Suddenly lines of fire, sparkling cords, outlined every projection of the architecture; the eyes of the sphinxes cast phosphorescent lightnings; a burning breath poured from the mouth of the idols; the elephants, instead of scented water, projected glowing streams; bronze arms issued from the walls holding lighted torches in their hands; in the carved calyx of the lotus flowers suddenly flamed dazzling aigrettes; great bluish flames rose and fell on the brazen tripods; giant chandeliers shed their light in a radiant vapour; everything shone and beamed. The colours of the prism broke and crossed in the air; the facets of the cups, the angles of the marbles and the jaspers, the chasing of the vases, — everything was studded with sparks, with gleams, or with flashes. Light poured in torrents, and coursed from step to step like cascades down the porphyry stairs. It resembled the reflection of a conflagration in a river. If the Queen of Sheba had ascended those stairs, she would have lifted up her gown, thinking she was walking in water, as on the ice floor of Solomon.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Through this brilliant mist the monstrous figures of the colossi, the animals, the hieroglyphs seemed to be animated and to live a fictitious life. The black granite rams sneered ironically and clashed their golden horns, the idols breathed heavily through their palpitating nostrils.

The orgy was at its highest point. Dishes of flamingoes' tongues and livers of scarrus, murreys fed on human flesh and prepared with garum, peacocks' brains, wild boars full of living birds, and all the marvels of a feast of antiquity multiplied a hundred-fold, were heaped up on the three sides of the gigantic triclinium. The wines of Crete, Massica, and Falerno foamed in the golden urns crowned with roses, which were filled by Asiatic pages on whose lovely hair the guests wiped their hands. Musicians playing on the sistras, the tympanon, on the sackbut and harps with twenty-one chords filled the upper bays and cast their harmonious melodies into the tempest of sound which spread over the feast. The thunder itself could not have been heard.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Meïamoun, leaning on Cleopatra's shoulder, felt his senses deserting him; the banquet hall was whirling around him like a vast architectural nightmare; through the dazzling light he beheld endless perspectives and colonnades; new zones of porticos rose above the real ones and plunged into the heavens to heights Babel never reached. Had he not felt Cleopatra's soft, cool hand in his own, he would have believed himself transported into the world of enchantment by a Thessalian wizard or a Persian mage.

Towards the end of the meal humpbacked dwarfs and tiny Moors performed grotesque dances and combats; then entered Egyptian and Greek maidens, representing the white and the black hours, dancing to an Ionian mode a voluptuous dance of inimitable perfection.

Cleopatra herself rose from her throne, cast off her royal mantle, changed her starry diadem for a wreath of flowers, slipped golden crotala on her alabaster hands, and began to dance before Meïamoun, lost in ecstasy. Her fair arms, curved like the handles of a marble vase, cast above her head streams of sparkling notes, and her crotala clattered with ever-increasing volubility. Standing upon the golden tips of her little feet, she advanced rapidly and touched Meïamoun's brow with a kiss; then she resumed her dance and fluttered around him, sometimes throwing herself back, her head down, her eyes half-closed, her arms limp, her hair undone and hanging, like a Bacchante of Mænalus inspired by her god; sometimes quick, lively, laughing, butterfly-like, indefatigable, and more capricious in her meanderings than a bee in pursuit of honey. She expressed everything,—heart's love, sensual voluptuousness, ardent passion, inexhaustible, fresh youth, the promise of future happiness.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

The modest stars had ceased to look. Their chaste, golden eyes could not have borne such a sight; even the sky was effaced, and a dim, fiery vapour covered the hall.

Cleopatra returned and sat down by Meïamoun. The night was waning; the last of the dark hours was about to fly; a bluish light penetrated with uncertain motion into this tumult of red light like a moonbeam falling within a furnace. The upper arcades became bluer; the day was dawning.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

Meïamoun took the horn vase held out to him by an Ethiopian slave of sinister countenance. The vase contained a poison so violent that it would have burst any other vessel.

Casting his life to his mistress in one last glance, he bore to his lips the fatal cup in which the poisoned drink was boiling and hissing. Cleopatra turned pale and placed her hand on Meïamoun's arm to restrain him. His courage touched her; she was just about to say, "Live on to love me; I will it," when the sound of clarions was heard. Four heralds rode into the banquet hall. They were officers of Mark Antony, preceding their master by a few steps. Silently she let go of Meïamoun's arm. A sunbeam played upon her brow as if to replace her absent diadem.

"You see yourself the time has come. It is day, the hour when fair dreams vanish," said Meïamoun. Then at one draught he emptied the fatal cup and fell as if struck by lightning. Cleopatra bowed her head, and within her cup a burning tear, the only one she ever shed, joined the melted pearl.

ONE OF CLEOPATRA'S NIGHTS

“By Hercules, my lovely queen, though I travelled fast, I see I have come too late,” said Mark Antony, as he entered the banquet hall. “Supper is over—but what is this body lying on the flags?”

“Oh, nothing,” said Cleopatra, smiling. “A poison I was trying; to use if Augustus should take me prisoner. Will you not, my dear lord, sit down beside me and watch these Greek buffoons dance?”

King Candaules

KING CANDAULES

I

FIVE hundred years after the War of Troy and seven hundred and fifteen years before the Christian era, there was a great festival in Sardis: King Candaules was being married. The people felt that sort of joyous anxiety and aimless emotion inspired in masses by any event, although it affects them in no wise, and occurs in higher spheres which they will never approach.

Since Phœbus Apollo, standing on his quadriga, had gilded with his beams the summit of Mount Tmolus, fertile in saffron, the worthy inhabitants of Sardis had been coming and going, ascending and descending the marble stairs which connect the city with the Pactolus, the rich river which Midas, by bathing in it, filled with golden sands. So important and solemn did these worthy citizens look that it would have been thought each of them was himself being married.

Groups formed on the Agora, on the steps of the temples, under the porticos. At every street corner were met women dragging by the hand poor children whose short steps ill accorded with the maternal impatience and curiosity. The maidens hastened to the fountains, their jars poised on their heads or upheld by their white arms as by natural handles, to supply the household with water in order to be free when the marriage procession should pass. The washerwomen were hastily folding up the scarcely dried tunics and chlamyds, and piled them on chariots drawn by mules. Slaves turned the grindstones without the overseer having to tickle their bare shoulders, marked with cicatrices, with his whip. Sardis was hastening to be done with the daily cares which cannot be dispensed with on account of any festival.

KING CANDAULES

The road to be traversed by the procession had been strewn with fine yellow sand. At intervals there arose to heaven odorous vapours of cinnamon and nard from brazen tripods. These were the only vapours that marred the purity of the blue sky; the clouds of a wedding day should be those only produced by the burning of perfumes. Branches of myrtles and of rose laurel strewed the ground, and on the walls of the palaces were displayed, suspended from bronze rings, tapestries on which the needles of industrious captives, mingling wool, silver, and gold, had represented various scenes of the history of the gods and heroes: Ixion embracing the cloud; Diana surprised in the bath by Actæon; the shepherd Paris, judge at the competition of beauty which took place on Mount Ida between Hera with the snowy arms, Athene with the sea-green eyes, and Aphrodite wearing the magical cestus; the old men of Troy rising as Helen passed through the Scæan gates, a subject drawn from the poem of the blind man of Meles. Many had exposed by preference scenes drawn from the life of Hercules the Theban, a delicate flattery intended for Candaules, who was a Heraclid, the descendant of Hercules through Alcæus. Others had been satisfied to adorn the threshold of their dwellings with garlands and wreaths as a mark of rejoicing.

KING CANDAULES

Among the groups stationed from the entrance of the royal palace to the city gate through which the young queen was to enter, the conversation turned naturally on the beauty of the bride, the renown of which filled Asia, and on the character of the husband, who, without being quite eccentric, seemed nevertheless difficult to understand from the ordinary point of view.

KING CANDAULES

Nyssia, the daughter of the satrap Megabasus, was endowed with marvellous beauty of features and perfection of form ; at least this is what the slaves who served her and the friends who accompanied her to the bath reported, for no man could boast of knowing aught more of Nyssia than the colour of her veil and the elegant folds which in spite of herself she imparted to the soft stuffs that draped her statue-like form.

Barbarians do not share the ideas of the Greeks on modesty. While the young men of Achaia do not scruple to exhibit in the sunshine of the stadium their torsos rubbed with oil, and the Spartan virgins dance unveiled before the altar of Diana, the youth of Persepolis, Ecbatana, and Bactra, prizing more highly modesty of the body than modesty of the soul, consider impure and reprehensible the liberties which Greek manners accord to the pleasure of the eye, and consider a woman shameless who allows men to see more than the tip of her toe, scarcely brushing aside, as she walks, the discreet folds of her long tunic.

In spite of this mystery, or rather, because of this mystery, Nyssia's reputation had rapidly spread throughout Lydia, and had become so great that it had reached even Candaules, although kings are usually the least well-informed people in their realm, living, as they do, like the gods, in a sort of cloud which conceals from them the knowledge of terrestrial things.

KING CANDAULES

The Eupatrids of Sardis, who had hoped that the young King might choose a wife from their family, the hetairæ of Athens, Samos, Miletus, and Cyprus, the lovely slaves who had come from the banks of the Indus, the fair-haired girls brought at great expense from the country of Cimmerian fogs, took great care never to utter before Candaules a single word which in any way might refer to Nyssia ; the bravest as regarded beauty hesitated at the thought of a rivalry which they felt must be unequal.

And yet no one in Sardis, or even in Lydia, had seen this formidable adversary ; no one, save a single being, who since that time had kept his lips as closed on the subject as if Harpocrates, the God of Silence, had sealed them with his finger. This was Gyges, the captain of the guards of Candaules. One day Gyges, full of vague projects and emotions, was wandering on the hills of Bactra, whither his master had sent him on an important secret errand. He was thinking of the intoxication of almighty power, of the pleasure of trampling the purple with golden sandals, of placing the diadem on the head of the loveliest. These thoughts made his blood surge in his veins, and as if following the flight of his dreams, he spurred with excited heel the foam-flecked flanks of his Numidian steed.

KING CANDAULES

The weather, calm at first, had become as stormy as the warrior's soul, and Boreas, his hair stiff with the ice of Thrace, his cheeks swollen, his arms crossed on his chest, was driving on the rain clouds with great blows of his wings.

A band of young girls gathering flowers in the country, terrified by the storm, were hastening back to the city, bearing their perfumed harvest in the folds of their tunics. Seeing a stranger arriving on horseback, they had, according to the custom of the Bactrians, thrown their mantles over their faces; but at the moment when Gyges passed by one, whose proud bearing and richer vestments seemed to mark her as the mistress of the company, a sudden gust of wind had blown aside her veil, and whirling it in the air like a feather, had carried it away so far that it was impossible to recover it. It was Nyssia, the daughter of Megabasus, who thus stood with uncovered face before Gyges, the captain of the guards of King Candaules. Was it indeed merely the breath of Boreas which had caused this accident, or did Eros, who takes pleasure in troubling souls, amuse himself in cutting the band which held the protecting tissue? However it may be, Gyges remained motionless at the aspect of this Medusa of beauty, and the folds of Nyssia's robe had long disappeared under the city gate before Gyges had thought of resuming his way. Although nothing justified his supposition, he felt that he had just seen the satrap's daughter, and the meeting, which had almost the character of an apparition, agreed so well with the thoughts that filled his mind at that moment, that he could not help believing it an act of Fate, an event planned by the gods. That was the brow on which he would have wished to place a diadem,—what other more worthy of it? But what probability was there that Gyges would ever have a throne to share?

KING CANDAULES

He had not attempted to follow up this adventure and to make certain that it was really the daughter of Megabasus whose mysterious face Chance, the great magician, had revealed to him. Nyssia had vanished so swiftly that it would have been impossible for him to find her again. But, besides, he had been dazzled, fascinated, thunderstruck, rather than charmed by her marvellous appearance, by her wondrous beauty.

KING CANDAULES

Yet her image, scarce seen for a moment, was engraved on his heart as deeply as the features which sculptors draw on ivory with a red-hot graver. In vain he had tried his best to efface it, for his love for Nyssia filled him with secret terror. Perfection carried to such a point is always troubling; women so similar to deities must be fatal to weak mortals; they are created for celestial amours, and men, even the most courageous, venture but tremblingly into such loves. So no hope had sprung up in the soul of Gyges, borne down and discouraged beforehand by the feeling of impossibility. Ere he could venture to address Nyssia, he felt as if he must strip the sky of its stars, rob Phœbus of his radiant crown; forgetting that women give themselves only to those who do not deserve them, and that the best way to be loved by them is to act as if one sought their hatred.

Since that day, the roses of joy no longer bloomed upon his cheeks. By day he was sad, gloomy, and seemed to walk alone in his dream like a mortal who has beheld a goddess; by night he was tormented by dreams that showed him Nyssia seated by his side on purple cushions, between the golden griffins of the royal throne.

KING CANDAULES

So Gyges, the only one who could have spoken of Nyssia from actual experience, having said nothing, the people of Sardis were reduced to conjectures, and it must be acknowledged that these were most strange and fabulous.

Nyssia's beauty, thanks to the veils which concealed it, had become a sort of myth, of canvas, of poem, which each embroidered according to his taste.

"If what is stated is true," lisped a young debauchee of Athens, his hand resting on the shoulder of an Asiatic child, "neither Plangon nor Archenassa nor Thaïs can be compared with this barbaric marvel; and yet I find it difficult to believe that she is the equal of Theano of Colophon, whom I purchased for one night at the price of the gold she could carry off when plunging her white arms up to her shoulders in my cedar coffer."

"By the side of her," added a Eupatrid, who pretended to be better informed about everything, "by the side of her the daughter of Cœlus and the Sea would look like a Theban servant."

"You are speaking blasphemy, and although Aphrodite is a good and kind goddess, take care lest you draw down her wrath upon you."

KING CANDAULES

"By Hercules!—which is an oath of some weight in a city governed by his descendants,—I do not take back a single word."

"You have seen her, then?"

"No; but I have a slave who formerly belonged to Nyssia, and who has told me many things about her."

"Is it true," asked in a childish way a doubtful-looking woman, whose pale-rose tunic, rouged cheeks, and hair shining with essences announced hopeless pretensions to a youthfulness long since vanished, "is it true that Nyssia has two pupils in each eye? It must be very ugly, I should think, and I cannot understand how Candaules should fall in love with such a monstrosity, while in Sardis and Lydia there are numbers of women whose eyes are irreproachable."

Saying these words, with all sorts of airs and affectations, Lamia cast a significant glance at a little metal mirror which she drew from her bosom, and which enabled her to restore to their place the curls deranged by the importunate breeze.

"As regards the double pupil, that strikes me as an old-wives' tale," said the well-informed Eupatrid;

KING CANDAULES

“but it is certain that Nyssia’s glance is so piercing that she can see through walls. In comparison with her, lynxes are short-sighted.”

“How can a serious man talk such nonsense?” interrupted a citizen, whose bald head and long white beard which he stroked while speaking gave him an air of philosophical importance and sagacity. “The truth is that the daughter of Megabasus does not naturally have better sight than you or I, only the Egyptian priest Thoutmosis, who knows so many wondrous secrets, has bestowed on her the mysterious stone found in dragons’ heads, which, as is well known, enables those who possess it to see through the most opaque shadows and bodies. Nyssia always wears that stone in her belt or her bracelet,—that is the explanation of her remarkable sight.”

The citizen’s explanation seemed more natural to the members of the group whose conversation I am attempting to relate, and the views of Lamia and the patrician were rejected as improbable.

“In any case,” resumed Theano’s lover, “we shall be able to judge for ourselves, for it seems to me that I hear the clarions sounding afar, and without having Nyssia’s sight I can see yonder the heralds advancing with palms in their hands announcing the arrival of the wedding procession and forcing the crowd back.”

KING CANDAULES

At this news, which rapidly spread, strong men used their elbows, to get to the front row; agile youths, embracing the shafts of pillars, endeavoured to climb to the capitals and sit there; others, at the cost of skinning their knees against the bark, managed to perch themselves comfortably enough in the elbows of the branches of trees; women placed their little children on one shoulder, advising them to cling closely to their necks; those who were fortunate enough to live in the street through which Candaules and Nyssia were to pass, looked from their roofs, or, raising themselves on their elbows, left for a moment the pillows which supported them.

A murmur of satisfaction and relief ran through the crowd, which had been waiting for many hours already, and the beams of the noonday sun were beginning to make themselves felt.

Warriors heavily armed with cuirasses of buffalo-skin covered with plates of metal, helmets adorned with aigrettes of horse-hair dyed red, knemids lined with tin, baldrics studded with nails, blazoned bucklers, and brazen swords, marched behind a row of trumpeters who were blowing hard in their long tubes that shone in the sunshine. The steeds of these warriors, as white as the feet of Thetis, might have served, by the nobility of their gait and their thorough breeding, as models for those which Phidias carved later on the metope of the Parthenon.

KING CANDAULES

At the head of this troop rode Gyges, well named, for in Lydian "Gyges" means "handsome." His features, almost absolutely regular, seemed cut out of marble, so pale was he, for he had just recognised in Nyssia, although she was covered with the veil of brides, the woman whose face the treason of the wind had exposed to his looks by the walls of Bactra.

"Handsome Gyges seems very sad," said the maidens. "What proud beauty has disdained his love? Or has some one whom he has neglected had a spell cast on him by a Thessalian witch. Can the magic ring, which he found, it is said, within the depths of a forest, within the flanks of a bronze horse, have lost its virtue and ceased to render its master invisible? Has it suddenly betrayed him to the astonished glance of some worthy husband who thought himself alone in his conjugal chamber?"

KING CANDAULES

“Perhaps he has lost his talents and his drachmas at the game of Palamedes, or else he is annoyed at not having won the prize at the Olympic Games. He reckoned greatly upon his horse Hyperion.”

None of these conjectures was correct. People never do guess the truth.

Next to the battalion commanded by Gyges came young boys crowned with myrtles, who playing upon ivory lyres with a bow, accompanied an epithalamium in the Lydian mode. They wore rose-coloured tunics embroidered with silver threads, and their hair hung down on their shoulders in thick curls. They preceded the bearers of presents, robust slaves whose half-nude bodies exhibited muscles which the most vigorous athlete might have envied.

On litters borne by two, four, or more men, according to the weight of the objects, were placed enormous brazen cups carved by the most famous artists; vases of gold and silver, their sides adorned with bassi-relievi, their graceful handles covered with chimeras, foliage, and nude women; magnificent ewers for the washing of the feet of illustrious guests; flagons encrusted with precious stones and holding the rarest of perfumes,—Arabian myrrh, Indian cinnamon, Persian nard, Smyrna essence of roses ; perfume burners, the covers pierced with holes ; coffers of cedar and ivory of marvellous workmanship, opening by secret methods unknown to any but the inventor and containing bracelets of gold of Ophir, necklaces of the finest orient pearls, clasps studded with rubies and carbuncles ; toilet cases containing yellow sponges, curling-irons, sea-wolves' teeth for polishing the nails, the green rouge of Egypt, which turns the loveliest red on touching the skin, powders to darken the eyebrows and eyelids, — in a word, all that feminine coquetry can invent in the way of refinement. On other litters were borne purple robes of the finest wool, and of every shade, from the carnation of the rose to the deep red of the juice of the grape ; calasiris of Canopean linen which are thrown white into the dyers' vats, and which, thanks to the different mordants with which they are impregnated, emerge diapered with the most brilliant colours ; tunics brought from the fabulous country of Serica, at the very extremity of the world, made with thread spun by a worm that lives on leaves, and so fine that they might have been drawn through a ring.

KING CANDAULES

Ethiopians, shining like jet, their heads bound with cords, so that the veins of their brows should not burst under the efforts they made to support their burden, carried in great pomp a colossal statue of Hercules, the ancestor of Candaules, made of gold and ivory, with the club, the Nemæan lion's skin, the three golden apples of the gardens of the Hesperides, and all the consecrated attributes.

KING CANDAULES

The statues of the celestial Venus and of Venus Genetrix, carved by the best pupils of the school of Sicyon in that marble of Paros whose brilliant transparency seems made on purpose to represent the ever youthful flesh of the immortal goddesses, followed the effigy of Hercules, whose powerful contours and muscular forms brought out still more strongly the harmony and elegance of their proportions.

A painting by Bularchus, bought for its weight in gold by Candaules, painted upon a panel of the wood of the female larch and representing the defeat of the Magnetes, excited general admiration by the perfection of the drawing, the accuracy of the attitudes, and the harmony of the colour, although the artist had made use of the four primitive colours only, — white, Attic ochre, red earth of Sinope, and atrament. The young King loved painting and sculpture rather more than beseems a monarch, and he often spent a year's income from one of his cities in the purchase of a costly painting.

KING CANDAULES

Camels and dromedaries with magnificent housings and trappings, bestriden by musicians playing on cymbals and tympanons, bore the golden pins, the cords and stuffs of the tent intended for the young queen when she went travelling or hunting.

On any other occasion these splendours would have delighted the people of Sardis, but their curiosity had another object, and this portion of the procession was watched with some impatience. The maidens, waving burning torches and scattering handfuls of crocus flowers, were not even looked at. The thought of beholding Nyssia filled every mind.

At last Candaules appeared riding on a car drawn by four horses, — handsome and spirited as those of the Sun, covering their golden bits with white foam, shaking their purple tressed manes, and held in with difficulty by the driver, who stood by the prince and leaned back to secure a greater purchase.

Candaules was a vigorous young man, who fully justified his Herculean descent. His head was joined to his shoulders by a bull neck; his black, lustrous hair curled in short, rebellious curls, and in places covered the band of the royal diadem. His small, straight ears were red; his brow was broad and full, though somewhat low like the brows of the people of antiquity; his glance, full of softness and melancholy; his oval cheeks, his chin with its gentle, easy curve, his mouth with half-opened lips, his athletic arm ending in a woman's hand, marked a poetic rather than a warlike nature; and indeed, though he was brave and skilful in every bodily exercise, breaking in a horse as cleverly as one of the Lapithæ, swimming across the rivers which flow from the mountains swollen by the melting snows, capable of bending the bow of Odysseus and of bearing the buckler of Achilles, he did not seem to be preoccupied by conquest; and war, so attractive to young sovereigns, had but mediocre attractions for him. He was satisfied with repelling the attacks of ambitious neighbours, without attempting to extend his possessions. He preferred to build palaces and to advise his architects, to collect statues and paintings by old and new masters. He possessed works by Telephanes of Sicyon, Cleanthes and Ardices of Corinth, Hygiemon, Dinias, Charmadas, Eumarus, and Cimon, — some mere drawings, others coloured or in monochrome. It was even said that Candaules had, forgetful of princely decency, not disdained to handle with his royal hands the sculptor's chisel and the sponge of the painter of encaustics.

KING CANDAULES

KING CANDAULES

But why do we dwell on Candaules? The reader, no doubt, like the people of Sardis, cares only for Nyssia.

The daughter of Megabasus was seated upon an elephant with wrinkled skin and huge ears like standards, that advanced with heavy but swift step like a vessel amid waves. Its tusks and trunk were bound with silver rings, strings of huge pearls wound around its pillar-like legs. On its back, covered by a magnificent Persian carpet with variegated designs, rose a sort of howdah covered with chased gold and studded with onyx, sardonyx, chrysolite, lapis-lazuli, and opals. In this howdah was seated the young queen, so covered with gems that she dazzled the eyes. A mitre shaped like a helmet on which pearls formed designs and letters after the Oriental fashion, covered her head; her ears, pierced in the lobes and on the edges, were laden with ornaments in the shape of cups, crescents, and balls; necklaces of open-work gold and silver balls hung in triple rows around her neck and fell upon her bosom with metallic rustlings; emerald serpents with eyes of rubies and topazes wound around her arms, biting their own tails. These bracelets were connected by chains of precious stones, and their weight was so great that two maids, kneeling on either side of Nyssia, supported her elbows. She wore a dress embroidered by the workmen of Tyre with brilliant patterns of gold leaves and diamond fruits, and over it a short Persepolis tunic, which came down almost to the knee, with sleeves slit open and held together by sapphire clasps. Around her waist she had a sash made of narrow stuff marked with stripes and designs that formed symmetrical patterns as they were brought together by the arrangement of the folds, which Indian girls alone know how to manage. Her drawers of byssus—which the Phœnicians call syndon—were fastened above the ankles by anklets adorned with balls of silver and gold, and completed a costume of barbaric richness absolutely opposed to Greek taste. But alas! a saffron-coloured flammeum closely masked the face of Nyssia, who appeared troubled, although she was veiled, at the sight of so many glances fixed upon her, and who often signed to the slaves placed behind her to lower the parasol of ostrich-feathers so that she might be the better concealed from the eager crowd.

KING CANDAULES

KING CANDAULES

In vain had Candaules begged ; he had been unable to induce her to throw off her veil even on this solemn occasion. The young barbarian had refused to pay to her people the welcome of beauty. Great was the disappointment. Lamia maintained that Nyssia dared not unveil for fear of showing her double eyes ; the young debauchee was convinced that Theano of Colophon was more beautiful than the Queen of Sardis ; and Gyges sighed when he saw Nyssia, after her elephant had knelt down, descend upon the bowed heads and the arms of the slaves, as down a living staircase, to the threshold of the royal dwelling, in which the elegance of Greek architecture was mingled with the fancifulness and the enormities of Asiatic taste.

II

MORE fortunate than the Sardians, who, after a day's waiting, were obliged to return home reduced as before to mere conjectures, I, as a poet, have a right to draw aside the saffron-coloured flammeum which veiled the young bride.

Nyssia was really more beautiful than she was said to be : it seemed as though nature had intended, in creating her, to use her power to the utmost and to be pardoned all her gropings and all her failures. It seemed as though, moved by a feeling of jealousy of the future marvels of the Greek sculptors, she also had tried to model a statue and to show that she was still sovereign mistress in matters of plastics.

KING CANDAULES

The grain of the snow, the micaceous brilliancy of Parian marble, the shining pulp of the flowers of the balsam, convey but an imperfect notion of the ideal substance of which Nyssia was formed. Her fine, delicate flesh was interpenetrated by the light, and the contours were modelled transparently in suave, harmonious, rhythmic lines. In her different aspects she was sunny or rosy, like the odoriferous body of a goddess, and seemed to radiate light and life. The world of perfections contained in the noble oval of her chaste face no man can ever describe, no painter reproduce with his brush, no sculptor with his chisel, no poet with his style, even were they Praxiteles, Apelles, or Mimnermus. On her smooth brow, shaded by waves of ruddy hair, like molten electron, and powdered with golden filings according to the Babylonian fashion, reigned, as on a jasper throne, the unchangeable serenity of perfect beauty.

KING CANDAULES

As for her eyes, if they did not fully bear out what popular credulity believed of them, they were at least wondrously strange. Brown eyebrows, the extremities of which were gracefully fined away like the ends of Cupid's bow, and joined by a line of hair after the Asiatic fashion, long fringes of silky, shadowy lashes, contrasted strangely with two sapphire stars playing on a sky of bluish silver which formed the eyeballs. The eyeballs, the pupil of which was darker than ink, showed singular variations of tint in the iris. They passed from sapphire to turquoise, from turquoise to aquamarine, from aquamarine to yellow amber, and sometimes like a limpid lake the bottom of which is strewn with gems, allowed to be seen at unfathomable depths sands of gold and diamonds on which green filaments wriggled and twisted like emerald serpents. In these eyes with phosphorescent flashes or beams of dead suns, the splendour of vanished worlds, the glories of eclipsed Olympus, seemed to have concentrated their reflections. On looking at them eternity was recalled, and one was seized with vertigo as when bending over the edge of infinity.

The expression of these extraordinary eyes was no less changeable than their colour. Sometimes the eyelids, half opening like the gates of the celestial dwellings, called one into elysiums of light, ineffable azure and felicity, promising the realisation of all one's dreams of happiness twenty-fold and a hundred-fold, as though they had read the secret thoughts of one's soul. At other times, as impenetrable as the bucklers composed of seven superimposed plates of the hardest metals, the glance fell against them weak and like blunted arrows. With a mere bending of the brow, with one turn of the eye more tremendous than Jove's lightning, they hurled one from the top of the most ambitious ascents into such deep nothingness that it was impossible to rise again. Typhon himself, who turns over under Ætna, could not have raised the mountains of disdain with which they overwhelmed one. They made one feel that even if a man possessed, in the course of a life of a thousand Olympiads, the beauty of the fair son of Leto, the genius of Orpheus, the boundless power of the Assyrian kings, the treasures of the Cabiri, the Telchines and the Dactyli, gods of subterranean riches, it would be hopeless to induce them to assume a softer expression. At other times they were filled with such eloquent, emotional, and persuasive languor, with such penetrating effluvia and radiations, that the ice of Nestor and Priam would have melted at their aspect as the waxen wings of Icarus on his approach to the burning zones. For a single one of these glances, a man would have imbrued his hands in the blood of his host, scattered to the four winds of heaven his father's ashes, overthrown the sacred images of the gods, and stolen fire from heaven like Prometheus, the sublime thief.

KING CANDAULES

KING CANDAULES

Yet their most common expression, I must say, was one of inflexible chastity, of sublime coldness, of ignorance of all possibilities of human passion, by the side of which the moon-like eyes of Phœbe and the sea-green eyes of Athene would have appeared more lascivious and alluring than those of a Babylonian maiden sacrificing to the goddess Mylitta within the roped-in space of the court of Succoth-Benoth. Their unconquerable virginity seemed to defy love.

Nyssia's cheek, which no human glance had profaned save that of Gyges on the day when her veil flew away, had a bloom of youth, a tender pallor, a delicacy of grain and down, of which not the faintest idea can be formed from the faces of our women, which are always exposed to the air and sunshine. Maidenly modesty flushed them with a rose such as might be produced by a drop of red essence within a cupful of milk; and

A bee would have mistaken her mouth for a flower, so perfect was its shape, the corners so exquisitely arched, the redness so living and rich; the gods themselves would have come down from their Olympic dwellings to touch it with their lips moist with immortality, had not the jealousy of the goddesses prevented them. Happy indeed the air that breathed through that purple and those pearls, that dilated the lovely nostrils so exquisitely formed and shaded with rosy tints like the interior of the shells cast by the sea on the shores of Cyprus at the feet of Venus Anadyomene! But that is just the way many delights are granted to things unable to understand them. What lover does not long to be the tunic worn by his beloved, or the water in which she bathes?

Such was Nyssia, if I may apply the words to so vague a description of her beauty. If our dull Northern idioms had the warm liberty, the burning enthusiasm of Sir-Hasirim, perhaps by means of comparisons, by calling up to the reader's mind recollections of flowers, perfumes, music, and sunshine, by evoking by the magic of words all that creation contains of graceful and charming ideas, I might have managed to give some notion of Nyssia's appearance. But Solomon alone may compare the nose of a beautiful woman to the tower of Lebanon that looks towards Damascus. And yet what more important in the world than a beautiful woman's nose? If Helen, the fair Tyndaris, had been flat-nosed, would the war of Troy ever have taken place, and if Sem Rami had not had a perfectly regular profile, would she ever have seduced the old monarch of Nin-Nebet, and bound on her brow the pearl mitre, mark of supreme power?

KING CANDAULES

Although Candaules had had brought to his palaces the loveliest slaves of Sour, Askelon, Sakkes, Razaf, the most famous courtesans of Ephesus, Pergamos, Smyrna, and Cyprus, he was completely fascinated by Nyssia's charms. He had not even suspected hitherto the existence of such perfection. Free, as her husband, to enjoy the contemplation of her beauty, he felt himself dazzled and seized with vertigo, like a man who bends over an abyss or stares at the sun. He experienced a sort of delirium of possession, like the priest intoxicated by the god which fills him; all other thoughts vanished from his soul, and the universe appeared to him only as a blurred mist wherein shone the brilliant figure of Nyssia. His happiness turned into ecstasy, his life into madness. At times his felicity terrified him. To be merely a wretched king, the distant descendant of a hero become a god by dint of labours, merely a common man, made of flesh and bones, and, without having done anything to deserve it, without even having, like his ancestor, killed the hydra or the lion, — to enjoy a happiness of which Zeus with the ambrosial hair would scarce be worthy, master of Olympus though he was! He felt in some sort ashamed to keep so rich a treasure to himself, to rob the world of such a marvel, to be the scaly, clawed dragon that guarded the living type of lovers', sculptors', and poets' ideals, all they had dreamed in their aspirations, their sorrows, their despair, — he, Candaules, the poor tyrant of Sardis, who had scarce a few miserable coffers filled with pearls, a few cisterns full of gold pieces, and thirty or forty thousand slaves, bought or taken in war!

KING CANDAULES

His happiness was too great for him, and the strength which he no doubt would have found to bear up under misfortune failed him in felicity. His joy overflowed his soul like water in a vase on the fire, and in the exasperation of his enthusiasm for Nyssia, he had come to the point of desiring that she were less timid and less modest, for it pained him to keep to himself the secret of such beauty.

KING CANDAULES

“Oh!” he said to himself, during the deep reveries which filled up all the time which he did not spend near the queen, “what a strange fate is mine! I am wretched at what would make the happiness of any other husband. Nyssia refuses to leave the retreat of the harem, and, in her barbaric modesty, to raise her veil for any one but me. And yet with what intoxication of pride would my love see her radiant and sublime, standing at the top of the royal steps, dominating my prostrate people, and eclipsing like the dawn of day all the pale stars which, as long as night lasted, believed they were suns! You proud Lydians who believe yourselves beautiful, you owe it only to Nyssia’s modesty that you do not appear, even to your lovers, as ugly as the oblique-eyed, thick-lipped slaves of Nahasi and Kush. If but once she were to traverse the streets of Sardis with uncovered face, in vain you would drag at the folds of your admirers’ tunics; none of them would turn their heads, or if they did, they would ask your name, so completely would they have forgotten you. They would cast themselves under the silver wheels of her car to enjoy the delight of being crushed by her, like the devotees of the Indus, who pave with their bodies the road traversed by their idol. And you, you goddesses whom Paris Alexander judged, if Nyssia had competed not one of you would have won the apple; not even Aphrodite, in spite of her cestus and her promise to make the shepherd beloved by the most beautiful woman in the world.

KING CANDAULES

“To think that such beauty is not immortal, alas! and that the years will spoil those divine lines, that admirable hymn of form, that poem of which the strophes are contours and which no one on earth has read or is to read but myself! To be the sole depository of such a treasure! If at least I could, with the help of lines and colours, and by the imitation of the play of light and shade, fix upon wood a reflection of her celestial face! If marble were not rebellious to my chisel, how I would carve out of the purest Parian or Pentelic stone a simulacrum of that lovely body that should make even the effigies of the goddesses fall from their altars! And long hereafter, when under the mud of floods, under the dust of vanished cities, men of future ages came upon some portion of that petrified image of Nyssia, they would say, ‘Such were the women of that vanished world.’ And they would raise a temple in which to place the divine fragment. But all I am capable of is stupid admiration, insensate love. Sole worshipper of an unknown divinity, I have no means of spreading her worship on the earth.”

KING CANDAULES

Thus in Candaules the artist’s enthusiasm had killed the lover’s jealousy, admiration was stronger than love. If instead of Nyssia, the daughter of the Satrap Megabasus, full of Eastern ideas, he had married a Greek girl of Athens or Corinth, no doubt he would have brought to his court the most skilful painters and sculptors and given them his queen as a model, as Alexander the Great did with Campaspe his favourite, who posed nude before Apelles. Such a fancy would not have been objected to by a woman coming from a land where the most chaste gloried in having contributed, one by her back, another by her bosom, to the perfection of some famous statue. But scarcely did shy Nyssia consent to throw off her veils in the discreet shadows of the bed-chamber; and the king’s hot eagerness shocked her, if the truth be told, more than it delighted her. The knowledge of the duty and submission which a woman owes her husband alone made her yield sometimes to what she called his caprices.

KING CANDUALES

Often he prayed her to let fall upon her shoulders the waves of her hair, a golden river richer than Pactolus; to place upon her brow a wreath of ivy and lime like a Bacchante of Menalus; to lie down on a tiger-skin with silver teeth and ruby eyes, scarce covered with a cloud of tissue thinner than woven wind, or to stand within a pearly shell, dropping from her tresses a dew of pearls instead of sea water.

When he had found the most favourable position, he lost himself in mute contemplation, his hand tracing vague contours in the air, some sketch, some projected painting; and he would have remained thus for hours, had not Nyssia, soon weary of her part of model, recalled to him, in a cold and disdainful voice, that such amusements were unworthy of royal majesty, and contrary to the sacred laws of marriage. "It is thus," she would say, withdrawing, draped to the eyes, within the most secret recesses of her apartments, "that mistresses are treated, and not honest women of noble race."

KING CANDAULES

These wise remonstrances had no effect upon Candaules, whose passion grew in inverse ratio to the coldness which the Queen exhibited towards him, and he reached the point of being unable to keep to himself the chaste secrets of his nuptial couch. He felt compelled to have a confidant like a prince in modern tragedy. He did not, as you may readily believe, choose a repellent philosopher with sour mien, whose long gray or white beard falls upon a cloak full of proud holes, nor a warrior who could talk only of ballistæ, catapults, and cars armed with scythes, nor a sententious Eupatrid full of counsel and political maxims; but he chose Gyges, whose renown as a lady-killer naturally gave him a reputation as a connoisseur in matters of women.

One evening he put his hand on Gyges' shoulder more familiarly and cordially than usual, and looking at him significantly, drew away from the group of courtiers, saying aloud, "Gyges, I want your opinion of my statue which the sculptors of Sicyon have just carved in the genealogical bas-relief on which are represented my ancestors."

"O King, your knowledge is greater than that of your humble subject, and I know not how to acknowledge the honour you do me by deigning to consult me," replied Gyges, with a sign of assent.

KING CANDAULES

Candaules and his favourite traversed a number of halls decorated in the Greek taste, in which the Corinthian acanthus and the Ionic volute bloomed and curled on the capitals of the columns, and the friezes were studded with figures in polychrome representing processions and sacrifices; they reached at last a remote part of the old palace, the walls of which were formed of irregularly shaped stones, laid dry after the cyclopean fashion. The proportions of this old architecture were as colossal as its character was formidable. The mighty genius of the old civilisations of the East was plainly imprinted upon it, and it recalled the Egyptian and Assyrian debauches of brick and granite. Something of the spirit of the old architects of the Tower of Lylacq survived in the squat pillars with deep, spiral flutings, the capitals of which were formed of four heads of bulls connected by knots of serpents that seemed to seek to devour them,—an obscure and cosmogonic emblem, the meaning of which was no longer intelligible, and which had gone down to the tomb with the hierophants of past ages. The doors were neither square nor round. They formed a sort of ogee not unlike the mitre of the magi, and added by their quaintness to the characteristic appearance of the building.

KING CANDAULES

This part of the palace formed a sort of court surrounded by a portico, the architrave of which was adorned with the genealogical bas-relief to which Candaules had alluded. In the centre was Hercules, the upper portion of his body bare, seated on a throne, his feet on a foot-stool, according to the rite for the representation of divine beings. His colossal proportions removed any possible doubt as to his apotheosis. The archaic rudeness and coarseness of the work, due to the chisel of some primitive artist, imparted to it an air of barbaric majesty and savage grandeur more in harmony perhaps with the character of the monster-slaying hero than the work of a sculptor deeply versed in his art.

On the right of the throne sat Alcæus, the son of the hero and of Omphale, Ninus, Belus, and Argon, the first kings of the dynasty of the Heraclids; then the whole series of intermediary kings, the last of whom were Ardys, Alyattes, Meles or Myrsus, the father of Candaules, and finally Candaules himself.

All these personages, with their hair plaited into cords, their curled beards, their oblique eyes, and their angular attitudes, their awkward, constrained gestures, seemed to be endowed with a sort of fictitious life due to the rays of the setting sun and to the reddish colours which time imparts to marble in hot countries. The inscriptions in antique characters, engraved near each by way of legend, added yet more to the mysterious singularity of that long procession of figures in strange, barbaric accoutrements.

KING CANDAULES

By a chance which Gyges could not help noticing, the statue of Candaules happened to occupy the last vacant place on the left of Hercules. The dynastic cycle was closed. To include the descendants of Candaules it would be necessary to erect a new portico, and to begin a new bas-relief.

Candaules, whose arm still rested on Gyges' shoulder, walked around the portico in silence. He seemed to hesitate about opening the conversation, and to have wholly forgotten the pretext under which he had brought his captain of the guards to this solitary place.

"What would you do, Gyges," at last said Candaules, breaking a silence that began to weigh on both, "if you were a diver, and from the green depths of the ocean you had brought up a perfect pearl, incomparable in brilliancy and purity, and more valuable than the richest treasures?"

KING CANDAULES

"I should enclose it," replied Gyges, somewhat surprised at the abrupt question, "in a cedar box covered with plates of bronze, I should bury it in some desert place under a displaced rock, and from time to time, when I could be sure of not being seen by any one, I would go and contemplate my precious gem and admire the colours of heaven mingling with its pearly tints."

"And I," replied Candaules, his eye lighted up with enthusiasm, "if I possessed so rich a gem, I would set it within my diadem, show it freely to every eye, place it in the bright light of the sun, adorn myself with its brilliancy, smile with pride on hearing people say: 'Never did any king of Assyria or Babylon, never did any Greek or Trinacrian tyrant, possess a pearl of such perfection as Candaules, son of Myrsus, descendant of Hercules, King of Sardis and Lydia. Compared to Candaules, Midas, who changed whatever he touched into gold, was but a beggar poor as Irus!'"

Gyges listened in amazement to Candaules' speech, and sought to penetrate the hidden meaning of these lyrical divagations. The king appeared to be in a state of extraordinary excitement; his eyes sparkled with enthusiasm, a feverish flush reddened his cheeks, his swollen nostrils drew in the air forcibly.

KING CANDAULES

“Well, Gyges,” continued Candaules, without appearing to notice his favourite’s disturbed look. “I am that diver. In the sombre human ocean in which jostle confusedly so many misshapen and misbegotten beings, so many incomplete or degraded forms, so many types of bestial ugliness, wretched failures of nature in her attempts, I have found a pure, radiant, spotless beauty, without defect, the real ideal, the fulfilled dream, a form which never a painter or a sculptor could have reproduced on canvas or in marble. I have found Nyssia!”

“Although the Queen is endowed with the timid modesty of the women of the East, and no man save her husband ever beheld the features of her face, Fame with the hundred tongues and the hundred ears has published her praises everywhere,” said Gyges, bowing respectfully.

“Mere vague, insignificant rumours. They say of her, as of all women who are not exactly ugly, that she is more beautiful than Aphrodite or Helen; but no one can imagine, even faintly, such perfection as hers. In vain have I besought Nyssia to appear without her veil at some public festival or some sacrifice, or to show herself for a moment leaning on the royal terrace, to give to her people the mighty benefit of one of her aspects, to bestow upon them one of her profiles, more generous in this than the goddesses who exhibit to their worshippers only pale simulacra in alabaster or ivory. Never has she consented to do so. It is strange, and I blush to confess it, dear Gyges,—once I was jealous; I sought to conceal my loves from all eyes; no darkness was deep enough, no mystery impenetrable enough; but now I do not know myself, I do not feel like a lover or a husband. My love has melted into adoration like thin wax in a burning brazier. All my feelings of jealousy and possession have vanished. No, the most perfect work which heaven has bestowed on earth since the day when Prometheus applied fire to the left breast of the clay statue, cannot be thus concealed within the icy shadows of the harem. If I were to die, the secret of this beauty would remain forever buried under the sombre draperies of widowhood. I consider myself guilty when I conceal her, as if I had the sun within my palace and prevented its lighting the world. When I think of the harmonious lines, the divine contours which I scarce dare touch with a timid kiss, I feel my heart near breaking; I long that a friendly eye should share my happiness, and, like the severe critic to whom a picture is exhibited, to have him acknowledge after attentive examination that it is irreproachable and that the possessor's enthusiasm is fully justified. Yes, many a time I have felt tempted to put away with a rash hand those detested veils; but Nyssia's fierce chastity would never forgive me. And yet I am unable to bear alone such great happiness; I must have a confidant of my ecstasy, an echo which shall answer my cries of admiration,—and that echo shall be you."

KING CANDAULES

KING CANDAULES

With these words Candaules abruptly disappeared into a secret passage. Gyges, left alone, could not help noting the course of events which seemed ever to put him on Nyssia's road. Chance had caused him to behold her beauty hidden from all eyes; of all princes and satraps, she had married Candaules, the very King whom he served; and by a strange caprice which he could not help considering almost fatal, that King had just made him, Gyges, confidences about the mysterious creature whom no one approached, and insisted upon completing the work of Boreas in the plains of

KING CANDAULES

Bactria. Was not the finger of the gods visible in all these facts? Did not the spectre of beauty, whose veil was being dropped little by little, as if to inflame him, lead him unsuspectingly towards the fulfilment of some great destiny? These were the questions which Gyges asked himself; but unable to fathom the obscure future, he resolved to await events, and left the Court of Portraits, where the shadows were deepening in the corners and rendering more and more strange and threatening the effigies of Candaules' ancestors.

Was it a mere play of light, or an illusion produced by that vague uneasiness caused in the firmest hearts by the arrival of night in antique monuments? Gyges, as he was about to step over the threshold, thought that low moans issued from the stone lips on the bas-relief, and it seemed to him that Hercules was making mighty efforts to free his granite club.

III

THE next day Candaules took Gyges apart to continue the conversation begun under the Portico of the Portraits. Freed from the difficulty of beginning the conversation, he opened himself unreservedly to his confidant, and if Nyssia could have heard him, she might possibly have forgiven his conjugal indiscretions in consideration of the passionate praise which he bestowed upon her charms.

KING CANDAULES

Gyges listened to these praises with the somewhat constrained look of a man who is not yet certain whether his interlocutor is not assuming greater enthusiasm than he really feels, in order to induce trustfulness slow to bestow itself. So Candaules said to him, with an accent of annoyance : —

“I see, Gyges, that you do not believe me. You think I boast, or that I have allowed myself to be fascinated like a coarse clown by some robust peasant girl on whose cheeks Hygeia has spread the crude colours of health. No, by all the gods ! I have collected within my harem, like a living nosegay, the loveliest flowers of Asia and of Greece ; since Dædalus, whose statues spoke and walked, I know everything which has been produced by sculptors and painters ; Linus, Orpheus, Homer, have taught me harmony and rhythm. I do not look with the bandage of love over my eyes ; I am judging coolly. The fire of youth has naught to do with my admiration, and were I as broken down, decrepit, and wrinkled as Tithonus, my action would still be the same. But I forgive your incredulity and lack of enthusiasm. To understand me you must behold Nyssia in the radiant brilliancy of her sparkling whiteness, without any importunate shadow, without any jealous drapery, such as nature herself modelled her in a moment of inspiration that shall never again return. To-night I shall conceal you in one corner of our apartment. You shall see her."

KING CANDAULES

"Sire! what are you asking of me?" answered the young warrior, with respectful firmness. "How, from the depths of the dust that I am, from the abyss of my nothingness, could I dare to gaze upon that sun of perfection, risking to be blinded for the rest of my life, or to see in darkness only a dazzling figure? Have pity upon your humble servant; do not compel me to an action so contrary to the maxims of virtue. Every man must look only upon what belongs to him. You know the immortal goddesses always punish imprudent or audacious men who surprise them in their divine nudity. I believe you; Nyssia is the loveliest of women; you are the happiest of husbands and of lovers; Hercules, your ancestor, in his numerous conquests, never found any one who approached your Queen. If you, the prince whom the most famous artists take for judge and adviser,—if you think her incomparable, what matters the opinion of an obscure soldier like me? So give up your fancy, which I venture to say is unworthy of your royal majesty, and which you will regret as soon as you have satisfied it.”

KING CANDAULES

“Listen, Gyges,” answered Candaules. “I see that you mistrust me. You think I seek to try you, but I swear by the ashes of the pile from which my ancestor rose a god, that I speak frankly and without any hidden thought.”

“O Candaules, I do not mistrust your good faith; your passion is sincere; but perchance if I were to obey you, you would conceive for me deep aversion, you would hate me for not having resisted more, you would seek to take from my eyes, forced to be indiscreet, the image which you would have allowed them to catch a glimpse of in a moment of delirium. And who knows whether you would not condemn them to the eternal night of the tomb, to punish them for having opened when they ought to have been closed?”

“Fear nothing, I give you my royal word that nothing shall happen to you.”

“Pardon your slave if I venture, after such assurance, to make another objection. Have you reflected that what you propose to me is a profanation of the sacredness of marriage, a sort of visual adultery? Often woman puts aside modesty with her garment, and when she has been violated by a glance, without having ceased to be virtuous, she may well believe that she has lost something of her bloom of purity. You promise to feel no resentment towards me, but who shall secure me against the wrath of Nyssia,—so reserved, so chaste, of such delicate, savage virtue that she might be supposed yet a girl, ignorant of the laws of Hymen? Suppose she learns of the sacrilege of which I shall have been guilty through obedience to the will of the King himself. To what torture will she not doom me in expiation of such a crime? Who shall protect me against her avenging wrath?"

KING CANDAULES

"I did not know that you were so wise and prudent," said Candaules, with a slightly ironical smile; "but all these dangers are imaginary. I shall conceal you in such fashion that Nyssia shall never be aware that she has been seen by any one else than her royal spouse."

Gyges, unable to object further, made a sign of assent to show that he yielded to the King's will. He had resisted as long as he could; his conscience was henceforth at peace as regarded what might happen. He feared, besides, by further resistance to Candaules' wish to interfere with the fate which seemed determined to bring him near Nyssia for some formidable and all-important reason which he was not allowed to understand.

KING CANDAULES

Without foreseeing what might be the end of it all, he vaguely saw pass before him innumerable, tumultuous, indistinct images. His hidden love, crouching at the foot of the staircase of his soul, had ascended a few steps, guided by the uncertain light of hope; the weight of impossibility no longer bore so heavily upon his breast now that he believed himself helped by the gods. For, indeed, who could have thought that the boasted charms of the daughter of Megabasus were to be no longer mysterious so far as Gyges was concerned?

"Come, Gyges," said Candaules, taking him by the hand; "let us turn this moment to account. Nyssia is now walking with her women in the gardens. Let us go and study the place and arrange our stratagem for to-night."

The King took his confidant by the hand, and guided him through the windings which led to the nuptial apartment. The doors of the bedroom were formed of boards of cedar so closely joined that it was impossible to notice the divisions. By dint of rubbing them with wool steeped in oil, slaves had made the wood shine like marble. The bronze nails with faceted heads which studded them, shone like purest gold. A complicated system of straps and metal rings, of which Candaules and his queen knew the secret, formed the lock, for in those heroic days locksmithing was still in its infancy.

KING CANDAULES

Candaules untied the knots, slid the rings on the straps, and raised with a handle, which he inserted into the mortice, the bar that closed the door; then, ordering Gyges to stand against the wall, he pushed back against him one leaf of the door so as to conceal him entirely. But the door did not fit so perfectly the frame of oak carefully polished and levelled by skilful workmen, but that the young warrior could, through the space left free for the play of the hinges, plainly perceive the whole interior of the room.

Opposite the door the royal bed stood upon a platform reached by several steps and covered with a purple carpet. Pillars of carved silver supported the entablature adorned with foliage in relief, amid which loves playéd with dolphins. Thick curtains embroidered with gold surrounded it like the folds of a tent.

KING CANDAULES

On the altar of the household gods were placed vases of precious metal, pateræ enamelled with flowers, two-handled cups, and all that was necessary for libations. Along the walls, lined with boards of cedar marvellously carved, were placed at intervals statues of black basalt in the constrained attitudes of Egyptian art, holding in their fists bronze torches in which were fixed pieces of resinous wood.

An onyx lamp, suspended by a silver chain, hung from that particular beam in the ceiling called "the black," because it was more exposed than the others to be soiled by smoke. Every night a slave had to fill this lamp with scented oil.

Near the head of the bed hung from a small column a trophy of weapons, consisting of a helmet with a vizor, a buckler lined with four thicknesses of bull-hide and covered with plates of tin and copper, a two-edged sword, and ash javelins with brazen heads.

From wooden pegs hung Candaules' tunics and mantles. They were simple and double,—that is, large enough to wrap twice around the body. Especially noticeable was a cloak thrice dyed in purple and adorned with embroidery representing a hunt in which Laconian molossi pursued stags and tore them to pieces, and a tunic the stuff of which, as fine and delicate as the pellicle of an onion, was as brilliant as if it were woven of sunbeams. Opposite the trophy of arms was placed an arm-chair encrusted with ivory and silver, the seat covered with a leopard-skin spotted with more eyes than the body of Argus, and an open-worked foot-stool, on which Nyssia laid her garments.

KING CANDAULES

“I usually retire first,” said Candaules to Gyges, “and leave the door open as it is now. Nyssia, who has always some flower to finish on her tapestry, sometimes delays joining me, but at last she comes, and as if the effort cost a great deal, slowly and one by one lets fall upon the ivory arm-chair the draperies and the tunics which envelop her all day like the wrappings of a mummy. From the depths of your retreat you can follow her graceful movements, admire her unrivalled charms, and judge for yourself if Candaules is a young madman who boasts wrongly, or whether he does not really possess the richest pearl of beauty that ever adorned a diadem.”

“O King, I should believe you even without this test,” replied Gyges, leaving his hiding-place.

KING CANDAULES

“Once she has thrown off her garments,” replied Candaules, without paying attention to his confidant’s words, “she comes and takes her place by my side. That is the moment you must seize upon to make your escape, for in walking from the arm-chair to the bed, she turns her back to the door. Step as if you were walking on the top of ripe grain; take care that not a grain of sand creaks under your sandals, hold in your breath, and withdraw as softly as possible. The vestibule is plunged in shadow, and the faint rays of the only lamp that remains lighted do not reach beyond the threshold of the room. It is certain, therefore, that Nyssia will be unable to see you, and to-morrow there will be some one in this world to understand my ecstasies and who will not be amazed at my mad admiration. — But the day is drawing to a close; the sun will soon lead his coursers to drink in the Hesperian wave at the extremity of the world beyond the pillars erected by my ancestor. Get back into your hiding-place, Gyges. Although the hours of waiting are long, I swear by Eros and his golden arrows that you will never regret them.”

With this assurance Candaules left Gyges again concealed behind the door. The forced inactivity of the King's young confidant gave free course to his thoughts. Certainly the situation was most strange. He loved Nyssia as one loves a star, without hope of his love being requited. Convinced of the uselessness of any attempt, he had made no effort to draw near her, and yet, by a concourse of extraordinary circumstances, he was about to be made acquainted with treasures reserved for lovers and husbands alone. Not a word, not a glance, had been exchanged between Nyssia and himself, for she was probably ignorant of the existence of him to whom her beauty would soon be no longer a mystery. To be unknown to her whose modesty would have nothing to sacrifice to him, was a strange position indeed. To love a woman secretly and to see himself led by the husband across the threshold of the nuptial chamber, to be guided towards the treasure by the very dragon that should have defended its approach, was not this enough to fill him with amazement and to make him admire the singular workings of chance?

KING CANDAULES

At this point of his reflections he heard steps sounding on the pavement. It was the slaves coming to renew the oil of the lamp, to cast perfume upon the coals of the kamklins, and to shake the

The hour was approaching, and Gyges felt the blood surging in his heart and veins. He even felt tempted to withdraw before the Queen's arrival, to tell Candaules afterwards that he had remained, and to indulge in the most excessive praise of Nyssia. It was repugnant to him, — for Gyges, in spite of his somewhat easy life, did not lack delicacy of sentiment, — it was repugnant to him to steal a favour for which he would willingly have given his life had it been granted freely. The husband's complicity made the deed more odious in some sort, and he would have preferred to owe to any other circumstance, the happiness of seeing the Marvel of Asia in her night-dress. Perhaps also — I must confess it as a truthful historian — the approach of danger had something to do with his virtuous scruples. Undoubtedly Gyges did not lack courage. Standing on his war chariot, his quiver rattling on his shoulder, his bow in his hand, he would have defied the proudest warriors ; out hunting he would have attacked without trembling the boar of Calydon or the Nemæan lion ; but — let who will explain the riddle — he shuddered at the thought of gazing upon a beautiful woman through the chink of a door. No one possesses every sort of courage. Then he also felt that he would not see Nyssia with impunity. This was about to be the decisive moment in his life. He had lost the repose of his heart because he had seen Nyssia for one moment. What would it be after what was about to happen? Would life be possible for him when to that divine face, which already inflamed his dreams, should be added a lovely body made for the kisses of the immortals? What would become of him if henceforth he could not contain his passion in shadow and silence as he had done hitherto? Would he give to the court of Lydia the ridiculous spectacle of an insensate love, or would he try to draw upon him, by his extravagance, the disdainful pity of the Queen? This was not unlikely, since the reason of Candaules, the legitimate possessor of Nyssia, had been unable to resist the vertigo caused by that superhuman beauty, — Candaules, the young and careless King, who up to that day had laughed at love and preferred pictures and statues to everything else.

KING CANDAULES

His reasoning was very sound, but very useless, however. At that very moment Candaules entered the room and whispered in a low but very distinct voice, as he passed near the door, "Patience, my poor Gyges; Nyssia will soon come."

KING CANDAULES

When he saw that he could not draw back, Gyges, who after all was a young man, forgot all in the happiness of feeding his eyes upon the exquisite spectacle which Candaules was about to give him. A young fellow of twenty-five cannot be expected to possess the austerity of a philosopher grown gray with age.

At last the soft rustle of stuffs trailing over the marble, easily discerned in the deep silence of night, announced the queen's coming. It was she. With a step as cadenced and rhythmical as an ode, she crossed the threshold of the bed-chamber, and the wind made by the floating folds of her veil almost touched the burning face of Gyges, who nearly fainted, and was obliged to lean against the wall, so great was his emotion. He recovered, and approaching the crack of the door, he assumed the most favourable position in order to lose nothing of the scene of which he was to be the invisible witness.

Nyssia walked towards the ivory footstool and began to take out the pins ending in hollowed balls, which fastened her veil to her head; and Gyges, from the shadowy corner where he was concealed, was able to examine freely the proud and lovely face, of which he had had but a glimpse; the round, delicate, yet strong neck on which Aphrodite had traced with the nail of her little finger the three soft rays which are even now called Venus's necklace; the back of the neck on which little playful, rebellious curls twisted and turned; the silvery shoulders which half emerged from the chlamyd like the disc of the moon showing from behind a dark cloud. Candaules, leaning on his elbow, watched his wife with an air of affected carelessness and said to himself, "Now Gyges, who seems so cold, so difficult to please, and so disdainful, must be half convinced."

KING CANDAULES

Opening a coffer placed on the table supported by lion's claws, the queen freed her beautiful arms, — which rivalled in whiteness those of Hera, sister and wife of Zeus, king of Olympus, — of the weight of the bracelets and chains of gems with which they were overladen. However precious these gems might be, they certainly did not equal the beauty of what they covered, and had Nyssia been a coquette, it might have been supposed that she put them on in order to be begged to take them off. The bracelets and the chasings had left upon her fine skin, tender as the inner surface of the lily, light, rosy prints, which she soon caused to disappear by rubbing them with the slender, rounded, delicate fingers of her small hand.

KING CANDALES

Then, with a gesture like a dove that fluffs out its snowy feathers, she shook out her hair, which, no longer held by the pins, rolled in soft curls down her back and her bosom like the flowers of the hyacinth. She stood still for a few moments before drawing together the scattered tresses, which she then bound in one mass. It was marvellous to behold the fair curls streaming like golden jets between her silvery fingers, and her arms undulating like swans' necks above her head to roll and fix the tress. If perchance you have ever glanced at one of those lovely Etruscan vases with black backgrounds adorned with one of those subjects designated "Greek toilette," you may have an idea of Nyssia's grace in that attitude which from the days of antiquity to our own times has furnished painters and sculptors with so many charming motives.

Having dressed her hair, she sat down upon the ivory stool and began to untie the bands that held her cothurns. We moderns, thanks to our horrible system of shoes, almost as absurd as the Chinese, have lost the conception of what a foot really should be. Nys-sia's was wondrously perfect, even in Greece and ancient Asia. The great toe, slightly separate like a bird's, the other toes somewhat long and arranged with charming symmetry, the shapely nails shining like agates, the clean, well-turned ankles, the rosy heel,— nothing was wanting to it. The leg which rose above the foot, and seemed in the light of the lamp to shine like polished marble, was irreproachable in form and outline.

KING CANDAULES

Gyges, absorbed in his contemplation, said to himself, although he understood Candaules' madness, that if the gods had granted him such a treasure, he would have known well how to keep it for himself alone.

"Well, Nyssia, are you not coming to sleep by my side?" said Candaules, seeing that the Queen was not making haste, and desiring to abridge Gyges' period of waiting.

"Yes, my lord, I shall be done presently," replied Nyssia, and she unhooked the clasp which fastened her peplum upon her shoulder. She had now nothing but her tunic to throw off.

Gyges, behind the door, felt the blood throbbing in his temples. His heart beat so loud that he was sure that it must be heard in the room, and to still its pul-sations he pressed his hand to his breast. When Nyssia, with a motion of graceful negligence, undid the girdle of her tunic, he felt his knees sink beneath him.

KING CANDAULES

Was it through some instinctive presentiment, or was Nyssia's skin, untouched by profane glances, endowed with such lively magnetic susceptibility that it could feel the glance of an impassioned though invisible eye? However it may be, she yet hesitated to take off her tunic, the last rampart of her modesty. Twice or thrice her bare shoulders, her breast, and her arms shivered nervously as if they were touched by the wing of a night moth, or as if some insolent lip had dared to approach them in the shadow.

At last, apparently making up her mind, she threw off the tunic, and the white poem of her divine body appeared suddenly in its splendour like the statue of a goddess stripped of its veils on the day of the inauguration of a temple. The light shimmered with pleasure over her exquisite form and enveloped it in a timid kiss, profiting by an occasion, alas! very rare. The rays scattered through the room, disdaining to illumine the golden urns and jewelled clasps and the brazen tripods, concentrated upon Nyssia, leaving everything else in darkness. If I were a Greek of the time of Pericles, I might praise at length her lovely, undulating lines, her elegant contours, her polished hips, her breasts which might have served as models for Hebe's cup; but modern prudery forbids such descriptions, for the pen is not permitted what is allowed to the chisel; and besides, there are things which can be written in marble only.

KING CANDAULES

King Candaules smiled with an air of proud satisfaction. With swift step, as if ashamed of being so beautiful, being but the daughter of a man and a woman, Nyssia drew towards the bed, her arms crossed on her breast; but by a sudden motion she turned around before she took her place on the couch by the side of her royal husband, and she saw through the crack of the door a burning glance blazing like the carbuncles of Oriental legends; for if it were not true that she had double pupils and possessed the stone found in the heads of dragons, it was true that her green glance saw in darkness like the glance of the cat and the tiger.

A cry like that of a doe shot by an arrow at the moment when she dreams peacefully under the foliage nearly escaped her, yet she managed to contain herself, and lay down by Candaules, cold as a serpent, with the pallor of death on her cheeks. Not a muscle moved, not a fibre stirred, and soon her slow regular breathing justified the belief that Morpheus had poured the juice of his poppies upon her eyelids.

KING CANDAULES

She had divined everything.

IV

GYGES, trembling and nearly out of his mind, had withdrawn, obeying carefully the directions given him by Candaules, and if Nyssia by a fatal chance had not turned her head as she set foot on the bed and seen him flee, no doubt she would have remained forever ignorant of the outrage done to her charms by a husband more passionate than scrupulous.

The young soldier, who was well used to the windings of the palace, had no difficulty in finding his way out. He traversed the city with disordered steps, like a madman escaped from Anticyrus, and having made himself known to the sentry on watch near the ramparts had the gates opened and went out into the country. His head was burning; his cheeks flamed as if with fever; through his dry lips his breath came short and quick. He lay down in search of coolness upon the grass wet with the dew of night, and having heard in the darkness through the thick grass and the watercress the silver breathing of a naiad, he dragged himself towards the spring, plunged his hands and arms in the crystal basin, bathed his face in it, and drank some water to calm the ardour by which he was devoured. Any one who had seen him thus in the faint light, bending desperately over the spring, would have mistaken him for Narcissus pursuing his own image; but certainly it was not with himself that Gyges was in love.

KING CANDAULES

The brief apparition of Nyssia had dazzled his eyes like the glare of lightning. He saw her floating before him in a luminous whirl, and he knew that never again would he be able to drive that image from his memory. His love had grown suddenly; it had bloomed like plants which burst into bloom with a thunderclap. Henceforth it was impossible for him to master his passion. It would have been as easy to advise the purple waves which Poseidon raises with his trident to remain at peace on their sandy beds and not to break in foam against the rocks of the shore. Gyges was no longer master of himself, and he felt the gloomy despair of a man who, riding on a car, sees his maddened horses, careless of the bit, flying in a wild gallop towards a rocky precipice. Innumerable projects, each more extravagant than the others, passed confusedly through his brain. He accused fate, he cursed his mother for having given him birth, and the gods for not having put him on a throne, for then he might have married the satrap's daughter.

KING CANDAULES

A hideous grief gnawed at his heart. He was jealous of the King. From the moment when the tunic, like a flight of white doves settling on the sward, had fallen at Nyssia's feet, it had seemed to him that she belonged to him, and he considered that Candaules had robbed him of what was his own. In his amorous reveries, he had not thought of the husband; he had thought of the Queen as of a mere abstraction, without thinking clearly of all the intimate details of conjugal familiarity, so bitter and so keen to those in love with a woman who belongs to another. Now he had seen Nyssia's fair head bending like a flower by Candaules' brown head, and the remembrance wrought his anger up to the highest pitch, — though a moment's reflection should have convinced him that matters could not have been otherwise, — and he felt springing up in his soul a most unjust hatred of his master. The act of compelling him to be present while the Queen undressed struck him as blood-thirsty irony, as an odious refinement of cruelty, for he forgot that his love for the Queen could not possibly be known to the King, who had sought in him merely a confidant of easy morals who was a connoisseur of beauty. What he should have looked upon as a wondrous favour, appeared to him a mortal insult which he thirsted to avenge. As he reflected that on the morrow the scene of which he had just been the invisible and mute witness would unquestionably be renewed, his tongue clove to his mouth, his brow was beaded with cold sweat, and his hands sought convulsively the handle of his broad, double-edged sword.

KING CANDAULES

However, thanks to the coolness of night, that wise counsellor, he became somewhat calmer and returned to Sardis before day had dawned sufficiently to allow the few matutinal inhabitants and the early rising slaves to mark the pallor of his brow and the disorder of his garments. He went to the post which he usually occupied at the palace, expecting that Candaules would send for him ere long; for whatever the feelings that agitated him, he was not powerful enough to brave the King's anger and avoid the part of confidant, which now inspired him with disgust only. Arrived at the palace he sat down on the steps of a vestibule wainscotted with cypress, leaned against a pillar, and, under pretext of being tired, threw his mantle over his head and pretended to sleep in order to avoid the questions of the guards.

KING CANDAULES

If the night had been dreadful for Gyges, it had been no less so to Nyssia, for she did not doubt for a moment that Gyges had been concealed there by Candaules himself. The persistent manner in which the king had begged her not to veil so closely a face made by the gods to be admired of men; the annoyance he had felt at her refusal to appear dressed in Greek fashion at sacrifices and public solemnities; the sarcasms which he had not spared her concerning what he called her barbaric shyness, — everything proved to her that the young Heraclid, contemptuous of modesty, like an Athenian or a Corinthian sculptor, had willed to admit some one to mysteries which all ought to ignore; for no one would have been bold enough, unless commanded by him, to adventure upon such an enterprise, in which discovery meant instant death.

Slowly passed the sombre hours! With intense anxiety she waited until morning mingled its bluish tints with the yellow gleams of the dying lamp. It seemed to her that Apollo was never again going to ascend his car, and that an invisible hand held back the sand in the hourglass. The night, which was as short as any other, seemed to her six months long, like Cimmerian nights.

KING CANDAULES

As long as it lasted, she kept motionless and straight on the edge of her couch lest she should be touched by Candaules. If until now she had not felt any very great love for the son of Myrsus, she at least had for him that serious and serene tenderness which every honest woman bears to her husband, although the Greek liberty of his manners frequently displeased her, and he entertained about womanly modesty ideas entirely contrary to her own ; but after such an affront, she felt for him cold hatred and icy contempt only. She would have preferred death to one of his kisses. Such an outrage, — for it is among barbarians, and especially among the Persians and Bactrians, the greatest dishonour to be seen nude, not only for a woman, but also for a man, — such an outrage was unpardonable.

At last Candaules arose, and Nyssia waked from her simulated sleep and hastened from the room, now profaned in her eyes as if it had been used for the nocturnal orgies of Bacchantes and courtesans. She longed to breathe purer air, and in order to give herself up freely to her grief, she hastened to take refuge in the upper apartments reserved for women, called her slaves by clapping her hands, and made them pour upon her arms, her shoulders, her breast, and her whole body ewers full of water, as if by means of this species of lustral ablution she hoped to efface the stain due to the glances of Gyges. She wished she could have torn away the skin on which the rays of his burning eyes seemed to her to have left traces. Taking from the hands of the servants the soft cloths used to dry the last drops of water, she rubbed herself with so much vigour that a faint, rosy flush showed on the places she had rubbed.

KING CANDAULES

“In vain,” she said to herself as she let fall the damp tissues and dismissed her maids, “in vain shall I pour over my body the waters of springs and rivers. The salt immensity of the ocean itself could not purify me. Such a stain can be washed out with blood only. Oh, that glance! that glance! It clings to me, enfolds, envelops, and burns me like the poisoned robe of Nessus; I feel it under my vestments like a flaming tissue which nothing can detach from my body. In vain now I may heap robe on robe, choose the most opaque stuffs, the thickest mantles, I shall none the less bear upon my nude flesh that infamous robe formed of an adulterous and shameless glance. In vain have I been brought up from my birth in retreat, enwrapped like Isis, the Egyptian goddess, in a veil which no one could have lifted without paying with his life for such audacity; in vain have I lived apart from any profane eyes, unknown to men, virgin like the snow on which the eagle itself has not pressed its talons, so high does the mountain which it covers raise its head in the cold, icy air. The depraved caprice of a Lydian Greek has sufficed to make me lose in a moment, without my being guilty, the fruits of long years of precaution and reserve. Innocent and dishonoured! Concealed from all and yet publicly exposed! That is the fate to which Candaules has condemned me. How do I know that Gyges at this very moment is not occupied in describing my charms to the soldiers on the threshold of the palace? Oh, shame! oh, infamy! Two men have seen me and yet enjoy at the same time the sweet light of the sun! Wherein does Nyssia now differ from the most shameless hetaira, from the vilest of courtesans? My body, which I had sought to make worthy of being the dwelling of a pure and noble soul, is now the subject of common talk; it is discussed like some lascivious idol brought from Sicyon or Corinth. It is approved or criticised: 'That shoulder is perfect; the arm is lovely, a shade too thin, perhaps' — how can I tell? All the blood rises from my heart to my face at the thought. Oh, beauty, fatal gift of the gods! Why am I not the wife of some poor mountain goatherd of simple, artless manners? He would not have placed on the threshold of his hut another goatherd to profane his humble happiness! My wasted form, my unkempt hair, my sunburned complexion, would have protected me from such coarse insult, and my honest plainness would have had no cause to blush. How dare I, after what has happened last night, pass by these men, upright and proud under the folds of the tunic which conceals nothing from the one or the other? I should fall dead with shame upon the floor. Candaules! Candaules! I had a right to more respect from you, and nothing I have done justifies such an outrage. Am I one of those wives whose arms wind like ivy around the husband's neck, and who more resemble slaves purchased for money for the pleasure of their master than ingenuous women of noble race? Have I ever sung amorous hymns after the meal, accompanying myself on the lyre, my lips wet with wine, my shoulders bare, my head crowned with roses? Have I ever given you cause, by any immodest action, to treat me as a mistress who is exhibited at the end of a feast to one's companions in debauchery?"

KING CANDAULES

KING CANDAULES

KING CANDAULES

While Nyssia thus grovelled in her grief, great tears flowed from her eyes, like rain-drops from the azure calyx of a lotus after the storm, and after rolling down her pale cheeks, they fell upon her beautiful hands, languidly opened like roses with half their petals gone, for no order from the brain desired them to act. Niobe, seeing her fourteen children fallen under the arrows of Apollo and Diana, was not more despairing and sad. But soon, recovering from this state of depression, Nyssia rolled on the floor, tore her garments, cast ashes upon her beautiful lustrous hair, rended her breasts with her nails, uttered convulsive sobs, and gave herself up to all the excess of Oriental grief, with the greater violence that she had been compelled to contain so long indignation, shame, the feeling of wounded dignity, and all the emotions that agitated her soul; for her pride in life had been broken, and the idea that she was irreproachable in no wise consoled her. As the poet says, "The innocent alone knows remorse." She repented of the crime committed by another.

KING CANDAULES

Nevertheless, she made an effort to master herself; she ordered to be brought the baskets filled with wools of different colours, the spindles covered with flax, and distributed work to her women as she was accustomed to do; but it seemed to her that the slaves looked at her meaningly, that they had not the same fearful respect for her as formerly; her voice did not sound with the same assurance, her gait had something humble and furtive about it. Inwardly she felt herself fallen.

No doubt her scruples were exaggerated and her virtue had been in no wise diminished by the mad act of Candaules; but ideas inbred from childhood possess irresistible power, and the modesty of the body is carried by Oriental nations to an excess almost incomprehensible to the peoples of the West. When a man desired to speak to Nyssia in Bactriana, in the palace of Megabasus, he had to do so with his eyes fixed on the ground; and two eunuchs, poniard in hand, stood by his side ready to plunge their weapons in his heart if he were bold enough to raise his head and gaze upon the princess, although her face was covered. It can easily be imagined, then, what a mortal insult must have been, to a woman thus brought up, the deed of Candaules, which, no doubt, would have been looked upon by any other as merely an improper liberty. So the idea of vengeance had immediately arisen in Nyssia's mind, and had obtained enough power over her to stifle, before it escaped her, the cry of offended modesty when, on turning her head, she had seen the burning glance of Gyges flaming in the darkness. She had displayed the courage of the warrior in ambush who, struck by a chance arrow, dares not utter a groan for fear of betraying himself behind his shelter of foliage or reeds, but silently lets his blood streak his flesh with long, red streams. If she had not repressed that first exclamation, Candaules, forewarned and alarmed, would have been on his guard and would have made more difficult, if not impossible, the carrying out of her purpose.

KING CANDAULES

She had yet no well-defined plan. She was, however, resolved to make him pay dearly for the insult to her honour. She had at first thought of slaying Candaules herself during his sleep with the sword suspended by the bed, but she revolted at the thought of imbruings her lovely hands in blood. She feared lest she might not strike a deadly blow, and angry though she was, she hesitated at a deed so extreme and so little in accordance with her womanliness.

KING CANDAULES

Suddenly she appeared to have come to a decision. She sent for Statira, one of the maids she had brought from Bactra, and in whom she placed great trust. She spoke to her for a few moments in a low voice and close to her ear, although there was no one in the room, as if she were afraid of being overheard by the walls. Statira bowed deeply and at once went out.

Like all people threatened by a great peril, Candaules felt perfectly secure. He was certain that Gyges had got out without being noticed, and he thought only of the delight of discussing with him the unrivalled charms of his wife.

So he sent for him and took him into the Court of Hercules.

“Well, Gyges,” said he, with a smiling look, “I did not deceive you when I told you that you would not regret having spent a few hours behind that blessed door. Was I right? Do you know of any woman as beautiful as the Queen? If you do know any one more beautiful than she, tell me so frankly, and bear to her from me this string of pearls, the emblem of power."

KING CANDAULES

"My lord," answered Gyges, in a voice trembling with emotion, "no human creature is worthy of being compared with Nyssia. It is not the queenly string of pearls which ought to adorn her brow, but the starry crown of the immortals."

"I was sure that your coldness would melt in the blaze of that sun. Now you understand my passion, my delirium, my insensate desires. Am I not right, Gyges, when I say that a man's heart is not great enough to contain such love? It must overflow and spread out."

A deep blush covered the face of Gyges, who now understood too well the admiration of Candaules.

The king perceived it and said, half smilingly, half severely, "My poor friend, do not be mad enough to fall in love with Nyssia. You would lose your pains; it was a statue I showed you, not a woman. I allowed you to read a few of the stanzas of a beautiful poem, of which I alone possess the manuscript. I wanted to have your opinion of it, — that is all."

"You need not, sire, recall my nothingness to me. Sometimes the humblest of slaves is visited in his dreams by a radiant and graceful apparition. That ideal form, that pearly skin, that ambrosial hair I dreamed of with my eyes open. You are the god who sent me the dream."

KING CANDAULES

"Now," went on the king, "I need not tell you to be absolutely silent. If you do not seal your lips, you run the risk of learning to your cost that Nyssia is not as kind as she is beautiful."

The king waved an adieu to his confidant and withdrew to inspect an antique bed carved by Ikmalius, a famous workman, which he was asked to purchase.

Candaules had scarcely gone, when a woman, wrapped up in a long mantle so as to show only one of her eyes, after the manner of the barbarians, emerged from the shadow of the pillars behind which she had remained hidden during the conversation of the king and his favourite, walked straight to Gyges, touched him with a finger on his shoulder, and signed to him to follow her.

V

STATIRA, followed by Gyges, came to a small door, of which she raised the latch by pulling a silver ring attached to a leather strap, and ascended a steep staircase cut in the thickness of the wall. At the top of the stair was a second door, which she opened by means of an ivory and copper key. As soon as Gyges entered, she disappeared without explaining to him what he was expected to do.

KING CANDAULES

Gyges felt curiosity, mingled with uneasiness. He did not quite understand the meaning of this mysterious message. He had fancied he recognised in the silent Iris one of Nyssia's women, and the way they had taken led to the women's apartments. He asked himself in terror if he had been perceived in his hiding-place, or whether Candaules had betrayed him. Either supposition was probable.

At the thought that Nyssia knew all, he turned hot and cold alternately. He tried to escape, but the door had been locked by Statira and his retreat was cut off. He therefore advanced into the room darkened by thick purple hangings, and found himself face to face with Nyssia. She looked like a statue coming towards him, so pale was she. The blood had left her face, a faint rosy tint showed on her lips alone; on her soft temples a few imperceptible veins formed a network of azure; tears had darkened her eyes and traced shining marks upon the bloom of her cheeks; the chrysoprase colour of the eyes had lost its intensity. She was even more beautiful and more touching thus; grief had given a soul to her marmorean beauty.

KING CANDAULES

Her dress, in disorder, scarcely fastened on the shoulder, allowed her bare arms, her bosom, and the upper part of her breasts to show in their dead whiteness. Like a warrior defeated in a combat, her modesty had surrendered. Of what use now the draperies which concealed her form, or the tunics with carefully closed folds? Did not Gyges know her? Why should she defend what was lost beforehand?

She walked straight to Gyges, and fixing upon him an imperial glance full of fire and command, she said to him, in a short, sharp voice:—

“Do not lie, do not seek vain subterfuges. Have at least the dignity and the courage of your crime. I know all, I saw you;—not a word of excuse, I shall not listen to it! Candaules himself concealed you behind the door; was it not thus it happened? And no doubt you think that that is the end of it. Unfortunately, I am not a Greek woman who yields easily to the whims of artists and voluptuaries. Nyssia shall serve as a plaything to no one. There now exist two men, one of whom has no right to be upon earth.

KING CANDAULES

Unless he dies, I cannot live. It shall be you or Candaules. You may choose. Kill him, avenge me, and win by that murder both my hand and the throne of Lydia, or let swift death prevent you henceforth from seeing, by cowardly complaisance, what you have no right to behold. He who ordered is more guilty than he who merely obeyed ; and besides, if you become my husband, no one shall have seen me who has not the right to do so. But make up your mind at once, for two of the four eyes in which my nudity has been reflected must have closed before night."

The strange alternative proposed with terrible coolness, with inflexible resolve, so greatly surprised Gyges, who had expected reproaches, threats, a violent scene, that he remained for a few moments pale and mute, as ghastly as a shade on the banks of the black river of Hell.

"I dip my hands in my master's blood ! Is it you, O Queen, who ask me to commit so great a crime ? I understand fully your indignation, I think it is justified, and it was not my fault that the sacrilege took place. But — you know it — kings are powerful, they belong to a divine race. Our fates rest in their august hands, and weak mortals may not hesitate to obey their orders. Their will overcomes our refusals as torrents carry away dykes. By your feet I embrace, by your dress I touch as a suppliant, be clement! forgive an insult which is known to none, and which will remain forever buried in darkness and silence. Candaules cherishes, admires you, and his fault springs only from excess of love."

KING CANDAULES

"Sooner could your speech move a granite sphinx in the barren sands of Egypt than me; winged words might issue from your mouth uninterruptedly for a whole olympiad without changing my resolution. A heart of brass dwells within my marble breast. Slay or die! When the sunbeam which is streaming through these curtains has reached the foot of this table, let your mind be made up. I wait." And Nyssia crossed her hands upon her bosom in an attitude full of sombre majesty.

Seen thus standing motionless and pale, with fixed eyes, contracted brows, wild-haired, her foot firmly pressed upon the pavement, she might have passed for Nemesis watching the moment to strike the guilty.

"No one willingly visits the darksome depths of Hades," replied Gyges. "It is sweet to enjoy the pure light of day, and the heroes themselves who inhabit the Fortunate Isles would willingly return to their country. Every man instinctively seeks to preserve himself, and since blood must flow, let it be the blood of another rather than mine."

KING CANDAULES

Besides these feelings, confessed by Gyges with antique frankness, he experienced others more noble, which he did not speak of. He was madly in love with Nyssia, therefore it was not the fear of death alone which made him accept the bloody task. The thought of leaving Candaules the free possessor of Nyssia was insupportable to him. And then, the vertigo of fatality was upon him. By a series of strange and terrible circumstances he was being carried on to the fulfilment of his dreams; the mighty tide bore him on in spite of himself. Nyssia in person was holding out her hand to help him ascend the steps of the royal throne. He forgot that Candaules was his master and his benefactor, for no man can escape his fate, and Necessity walks with nails in the one hand and whip in the other, to stay man or drive him on.

"It is well," answered Nyssia. "Here is the weapon," and she drew from her bosom a Bactrian poniard with jade handle adorned with circles of white gold. "This blade is made, not of brass, but of iron hard to work, tempered in fire and water; Hephæstus himself could not forge a sharper. It will pierce like thinnest papyrus a metal cuirass or a buckler covered with dragon-skin. The time," she continued, with the same icy coldness, "shall be when he is asleep. Let him slumber and never wake again."

KING CANDAULES

Her accomplice Gyges listened to her in a stupor, for he had not expected such resolution in a woman who could not bring herself to draw aside her veil.

"The place of ambush shall be the very spot where the infamous wretch concealed you to expose me to your glance. At the approach of night I shall push back the door upon you; I shall undress, lie down, and when he is asleep I shall sign to you. But do not hesitate, do not weaken, and let not your hand tremble when the time is come. And now, lest you should change your mind, I shall secure your person until the fatal moment. You might attempt to escape, to inform your master. Abandon all such hope."

Nyssia whistled in a peculiar way, and immediately, raising a Persian hanging enriched with a flower pattern, gave passage to four tawny monsters dressed in robes rayed with diagonal stripes, with muscular arms like knotty oaks; big thick lips; golden rings passed in their nostrils; teeth sharp as wolves', and an expression of brutish servility hideous to behold.

KING CANDAULES

The Queen spoke a few words in a tongue unknown to Gyges, — Bactrian, no doubt; the four slaves sprang upon the young man, seized him, and carried him away as a nurse carries away a child in her arms.

Now what was the real motive which induced Nyssia to act? Had she noticed Gyges when she met him near Bactra, and kept the remembrance of the young captain in one of those secret recesses of the heart in which the most honest women always have something hidden? Was the desire to avenge her modesty spurred on by some other unconfessed desire? If Gyges had not been the handsomest youth in Asia, would she have been as eager to punish Candaules for having outraged the sacredness of marriage? These are questions difficult to answer, especially three thousand years later, and although I have consulted Herodotus, Hephæstion, Plato, Dositheus, Archilochus of Paros, Hesychius of Miletus, Ptolemy, Euphorion, and all those who have spoken at length or shortly of Nyssia, Candaules, and Gyges, I have been unable to reach any certain result. To ascertain after so many centuries, under the ruins of so many fallen empires, under the ashes of vanished nations, so slight a distinction, is difficult.

KING CANDAULES

What is certain is that Nyssia's resolve was inflexible, the murder seemed to her the fulfilment of a sacred duty. Among barbaric nations any man who has surprised a woman nude is put to death. The Queen believed herself justified; only, as the insult had been secret, she did herself justice as best she could. The passive accomplice was to become the executioner of the other, and the punishment to spring from the crime itself; the hand was to chastise the head.

The olive-complexioned monsters shut Gyges up in an obscure part of the palace, whence it was impossible that he should escape and from which his cries could not be heard. He spent the rest of the day in cruel anxiety, accusing the hours of being lame, and again of passing too quickly. The crime he was about to commit, although in a way he was but the instrument and yielded to irresistible ascendancy, presented itself to his mind under the darkest colours. Suppose the blow should fail through some circumstance which no man could foresee; or the people of Sardis were to revolt and to seek to avenge the death of the King;—these were some of the very sensible but quite useless reflections which Gyges made while waiting to be brought out of his prison and led to the place whence he was to issue only to slay his master.

KING CANDAULES

At last night spread its starry mantle over the heavens, and darkness fell upon the city and the palace. A light step was heard, a veiled woman entered the room, took Gyges by the hand, and led him through obscure corridors and the many windings of the royal edifice with as much certainty as if she had been preceded by a slave bearing lamps or torches. The hand which held that of Gyges was cold, soft, and small, but the slender fingers pressed his and hurt him as the fingers of a brazen statue made alive by a prodigy. Inflexible will was expressed by the ever-equal pressure, like that of a pair of pincers, which no hesitation of brain or heart caused to relax. Gyges, overcome, subjugated, bowed down, yielded to the imperious hand that drew him along as if he were dragged by the mighty arm of Fate.

Alas! this was not the way in which he would have loved to touch for the first time the beautiful royal hand which was holding out a dagger to him and leading him to murder! For it was Nyssia herself who had come to seek Gyges to place him in his ambush.

KING CANDAULES

Not a word passed between the sinister couple during the progress from the prison to the nuptial chamber. The Queen undid the straps, raised the bar of the door, and placed Gyges behind the leaf as Candaules had done the night before. The repetition of the same acts, with so different an intention, had a lugubrious and fatalistic character. Vengeance this time stepped upon the very prints of the insult; chastisement and crime travelled by the same road. Yesterday it had been the turn of Candaules; to-day it was that of Nyssia and Gyges; the accomplice of the insult was also the accomplice of the penalty. He had served the King to dishonour the Queen; he was to serve the Queen by slaying the King, exposed equally by the vice of the one and the virtue of the other.

The daughter of Megabasus appeared to feel a savage joy, a fierce pleasure, in employing only the means chosen by the Lydian King, and in turning to the account of murder the precautions he had taken for the satisfaction of a voluptuous fancy.

KING CANDAULES

“You shall see me again to-night take off the garments which displease Candaules so much. The sight no doubt wearies you,” said the Queen, with an accent of bitter irony, as she stood on the threshold of the chamber. “You will end by thinking me ugly,” and sardonic, fierce laughter twisted for a moment her pale lips. Then, resuming her impassible and severe face : “Do not imagine that you can escape this time as you did before. You know my glance is piercing. At the least movement on your part, I shall awaken Candaules, and you understand it will not be easy to explain what you are doing in the King’s apartment behind the door with a poniard in your hand. Besides, my Bactrian slaves, the copper-coloured mutes who shut you up, are guarding the issues of the palace and have orders to slay you if you go out. So let no vain scruples of faithfulness stay your hand. Remember that I shall make you King of Sardis, and that I—I shall love you if you avenge me. The blood of Candaules shall be your purple, and his death shall give you his place in his bed.”

The slaves came, according to their custom, to renew the coals on the tripods, to fill up the lamps with oil, to spread upon the royal bed carpets and skins of animals; and Nyssia hastened to enter the room as soon as she heard their steps sounding in the distance.

KING CANDAULES

Soon after, Candaules arrived, quite joyous. He had purchased the bed carved by Ikmalius, and intended to substitute it for the Oriental couch, which, he said, he had never greatly cared for. He seemed satisfied to find Nyssia already in the chamber.

“So your embroidery frame, your spindles and needles have not had the same charms for you to-day as usually? I do not wonder at it. It is monotonous work to pass a thread continually between other threads, and I am surprised at the pleasure which you seem to take in it. The truth is, I was afraid that some day, seeing you so clever, Pallas Athena would angrily break her shuttle on your head, as she did to poor Arachne.”

“My lord, I felt somewhat weary to-night, and I came down from the upper rooms earlier than usual. Will you not, before sleeping, drink a cup of the black Samian wine mingled with honey of Hymettus?” And as she spoke, she poured from a golden urn into a cup of the same metal the dark-coloured drink, in which she had mingled the sleep-compelling juices of the nepenthe.

KING CANDAULES

Candaules took the cup by the two handles, and drank the wine to the last drop; but the young Heraclid had a strong head, and with his elbow sunk on the pillows of the couch, he watched Nyssia unrobe without the dust of sleep yet filling his eyes.

Just as she had done the night before, Nyssia undid her hair and let its splendid golden waves fall upon her shoulders; and Gyges, from his hiding-place, thought he saw them gleam with fiery tints, lit up by the reflections of flame and of blood, and the curls stretching out with viper-like undulations like the hair of Medusa.

Her simple and graceful action derived from the terrible deed which was about to happen a frightful and fatal character which made the concealed assassin tremble with terror.

Nyssia next took off her bracelets, but her hands, stiffened by nervous contractions, ill served her impatience. She broke the thread of a bracelet of amber beads incrusting with gold, which rolled noisily on the floor, and made Candaules half open his eyelids, but he again closed them. Each of the grains struck on Gyges' heart like a drop of molten lead on water.

Having unloosed her cothurns, the Queen cast her outer tunic upon the back of the ivory arm-chair. The drapery, thus laid, seemed to Gyges like the sinister cloth in which the dead are wrapped to bear them to the funeral pile. Everything in the room, which the night before he had thought so bright and splendid, seemed to him livid, darksome, and threatening. The basalt statues moved their eyes and sneered hideously; the lamp crackled and scattered its light in red, bloody beams like the hair of a comet; in the dark corners showed portentous, monstrous forms of larvæ and of lemurs. The cloaks, suspended from the pins, seemed to have a factitious life, to assume a human appearance, and when Nyssia, throwing off her last garment, advanced towards the bed white and nude, he thought Death had broken the diamond bonds with which Hercules had of yore chained it to the gates of Hell when he delivered Alcestis, and was coming in person to seize upon Candaules.

KING CANDAULES

The King, overcome by the bitter juices of the nepenthe, had fallen asleep. Nyssia signed to Gyges to leave his retreat, and placing her finger upon Candaules' breast, she cast on her accomplice a glance so moist, so lustrous, so laden with languor, so full of intoxicating promise, that Gyges, maddened, fascinated, sprang from his hiding-place like a tiger from the rock on which it has lain, traversed the room at one leap, and plunged to the hilt the Bactrian dagger into the heart of the descendant of Hercules.

KING CANDAULES

Nyssia's modesty was avenged, and Gyges' dream had come true.

Thus ended the dynasty of the Heraclids, after having lasted five hundred and five years, and thus began that of the Mermnades in the person of Gyges, son of Dascylus. The Sardians, indignant at the death of Candaules, were ready to revolt, but the Delphic Oracle, having declared in favour of Gyges, who had sent it a great number of silver vases and six golden craters weighing thirty talents, the new king maintained himself on the throne of Lydia, which he occupied for many years, living happily and showing his wife to no one, knowing too well what it cost to do so.

1800

1801

1802

1803

1804

1805

1806

1807

1808

1809

1810

1811

1812

1813

1814

1815

1816

1817

1818

1819

1820

1821

1822

1823

1824

1825

1826

1827

1828

1829

1830

PQ
2258
A27 1910
v.4

Gautier, Theophile
Complete works

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY
